EDITOR'S PREFACE.

No Grammar can pretend to teach us every thing in a language; and this may be said of the present work, as of every other. Yet Cobbett's French Grammar, like his English Grammar, while affording the ordinary means of a Manual for the Teacher, may be said to give an insight to the language, and, consequently, an encouragement for the Student to persevere, which are to be had from no other publication.

Those who are without a Teacher, and depending on their own industry unaided, will meet with nothing answering their purpose like this work; and the best evidence of its merits, in explaining the principles and the main difficulties of the French language, is to be seen in the fact, that the Editors of some established books for teaching French are found to adopt Cobbett's mode of clearing up those things which are the most troublesome to comprehend.

In revising this, the Eleventh Edition, my chief business has been that of correcting certain inaccuracies, without, however, in any way altering the Author's arrangement of the several matters, or his manner of treating them. Here and there it appeared useful to add a further illustration. But such additions will all be seen separate from the original text, within brackets, thus, [], and generally with the word Note prefixed to them.

hardy possible to imagine; and these will be by no means diminished by the reflection, that we owe them to our own want of attention and industry.

- 5. Though many of the French books are translated into English, the far greater part are not; and in every branch of knowledge, great indeed is the number of those books which it may be useful to read. there only the pain arising from the want of a knowledge of French, when we fall into a company where we hear one of our own nation conversing with a Frenchman, this alone ought to be more than sufficient to urge a young person on to the study. I remember a young lady, in Long Island, who had been out on a visit to a house where one of the company happened to be a French lady who could not speak English, and where a young American lady had been interpretess between this foreigner and the rest of the company; and I shall never forget the manner in which the first-mentioned young lady expressed the sense of her humiliation: "I "never before," said she, "in all my life, felt envy; but "there was Miss ----, first turning to the right and "then to the left, and at each turn changing her "language; and there sat I like a post, feeling myself "more her inferior than I can describe."
- 6. It is really thus. This talent gives, in such cases, not only an air of superiority, but also a reasonable and just claim to real superiority, because it must be manifest to every one, that it is the effect of attention and of industry as well as of good natural capacity of mind. It is not a thing like dancing or singing, perfection in the former of which is most likely to arise from an accidental pliancy of the limbs, and in the latter, from an organization of the throat and lungs, not less accidental; it is not a thing of this sort, but a thing, the possession of which necessarily implies considerable powers of mind, and a meritorious application of those powers. Besides these considerations, there is this, that by learning French well you will really become more thoroughly acquainted with your own language. If Dr. Johnson had known the French language, he could have searcely committed any of those numerous blunders (relating to words from the French) which are contained in his Dictionary, and of which I will here give you a specimen. He has this passage: "RABBET: "a joint made by paring two pieces of wood so that "they wrap over one another." Then, the verb he has thus: "To RABBET: to pare down two pieces of wood "so as to fit one another." The Doctor meant "to "muke them fit one another." But to our point: the Doctor says, that to RABBET comes from the French verb RABBATRE, which means to bate or abate, to bring down. So, says the Doctor, to rabbet comes from rabbatre; for the wood is brought down by the carpenter's tool! What! Doctor? to bate, abate, the wood! This is far-fetched indeed. Now, if the Doctor had known French only tolerably well, he would have known that RABOT is a carpenter's plane; that raboter is to plane wood with a carpenter's plane; and that boards fitted together by means of the plane, and not by means of the saw, the chisel, or other tools, are boards rabotés, or, in English, raboted. How plain is all this! And how clear it is that we have here got a piece of nonsense in our language, because Dr. Johnson did not know French.

7. Having now spoken of the motives to the learning of French, I shall, in the next Letter, speak of the way to go to work, and how to proceed, in order to accomplish the object. Before, however, I proceed further, let me explain to you the meaning of the numerical figures which I have used here from I to 7. Each of the portions of writing, distinguished by these figures respectively, is called a paragraph; and as you, in the course of the Letters that I am addressing to you, will find yourself frequently directed to look at parts of them, other than the part which you are then reading, you will more quickly find the thing which you want, by being referred to the paragraph, than you would if you were referred to the page.

8. The hope which I entertain of seeing you write, and of hearing you speak French correctly; is, I am sure, equalled by the desire which you have not to disappoint that hope. My dear little son, I beg you to remember, that to succeed in an undertaking like this requires great assiduity and perseverance; but remember also, that nothing is justly gained without labour of some sort or other; and bear constantly in mind, that, in proportion to your increase in knowledge and talent, will be the increase of the satisfaction of your affectionate father.

WILLIAM COBBETT,

LETTER II.

ON THE WAY. OF GOING TO WORK AND OF PROCEEDING IN THE BEARNING OF FRENCH.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- 9. It is not sufficient that the thing we seek to gain is useful in its nature; nor is it sufficient that, in addition to this, we are assiduous and persevering in the pursuit of it. We must go the right way to work, set out and go on in the right path; or our labour, if not wholly lost, will be in great part, at least, spent in vain.
- 10. Parents innumerable well know that young people of good capacity frequently spend year after year in what is called learning French, and that at the end of the time they really know very little of the matter. Out of a thousand of those who are usually at the schools denominated "French Scholars," there are perhaps not twenty who ever become able to write a letter or to hold a conversation in French. How did it happen, then, that I, who had every disadvantage to make head against; who began to study French in the woods of North America in 1791; who crossed the Atlantic Ocean twice between that year and 1793; how did it happen that I, who had never had a master to assist me but one single month in 1792, should, in 1793, write and publish, in the French language, a Grammar for the teaching of French people English; which Grammar, first published at Philadelphia, found its way to France, and has long been, for the purpose for which it was intended, in general use throughout all the countries of Europe?

- 11. True, I was very assiduous, very persevering (as I trust you will be), and I had also good natural capacity; but my firm belief is, that in these respects I did not exceed any one of thousands upon thousands, who, after years of expense to their parents and of torment to themselves, give up the pursuit in disgust, from perceiving that they have really learnt nothing that is worthy of being called French. Nor is this result at all surprising when we come to look into the books called "French Grammars," where we find such a mass of confusion, that the wonder is, not that so few persons learn French, but that it is ever learned by any one at all.
- 12. I found it necessary to make a sort of Grammar for myself; to write down the principles and rules as I went on; to pick my way along by means of the Dictionary; to get over the difficulties by mere dint of When I afterwards came to teach the English labour. language to French people in Philadelphia, I found that none of the Grammars then to be had were of much use to me. I found them so defective, that I wrote down instructions and gave them to my scholars in manuscript. At the end of a few months this bccame too troublesome, and these manuscript instructions assumed the shape of a Grammar in print, the copyright of which I sold to Thomas Bradford, a bookseller of Philadelphia; for a hundred dollars, or twentytwo pounds eleven shillings and sixpence; which Grammar, under the title of Maître d'Anglais, is, as I have just observed, now in general use all over Europe.
 - 13. The great fault of all the French Grammars that I have met with is that which, as Mr. Tull tell us, Lord Bacon found in the books on farming and gardening; namely, that they contain no principles; or, in other words, that they give us no reasons for our doing that which they tell us we must do. Indeed, these Grammars are, as far as my observation has gone, little more than masses of rules, of vocabularies, and of tables; things heaped together, apparently for the express purpose of loading the memory and of creating disgnst. These Grammars take the scholar into the subject withont any preparation; they give him no clear description or account of the thing which he is going to learn; their manner of going from one topic to another is so abrupt that all is unconnected in the mind of the scholar; they seldom or ever give him any reason for anything that he is instructed to do; they never explain to him that which he does not understand by that which he does understand; and, in short, they are of very little use to either master or scholar.

- 14. In the Grammar which I am now writing for you, I shall endeavour to make the undertaking as little wearisome as possible. But, even here, I should observe to you, that a foreign language is a thing not to be learned without labour, and a great deal of labour too. It is a valuable acquisition, and there must be value given for it. It is a thing to be purchased only with labour, and the greater part of that labour must be performed by the scholar.
- 15. I have to perform the double task of teaching you Grammar and of teaching you French. If you knew your own language grammatically, the undertaking would be much easier for me and much easier for you; but let it be remembered, that in proportion to the greatness of the difficulty is the merit which justice awards to success. I have adopted the epistolary form, that is, I write in the form of Letters, for the sake of plainness, and, at the same time, for the sake of obtaining and securing your attention. We are naturally more attentive to that which is addressed to us than we are to that which reaches our ear or our eyes as mere unpointed observation. You do not yet know what it is that grammarians call impersonal verbs; but in giving instructions, the impersonal mode of speaking must be less forcible as well as less clear than the personal. "You must take care," is a very different thing from "Care must be taken;" or it has, at any rate, a very different effect upon the reader.

16. The manner in which I propose to proceed in the teaching of you is this: First, I shall, in Letter III., explain to you what Grammar is, what is the meaning of the word. I shall then, in Letter IV., teach you what are the different parts of speech or sorts of words. I shall treat of the nature and use of each of these sorts of words or parts of speech; and at every stage I shall show you, in the plainest manner that I am able, the difference between your own language and the French language; for this it is that you want to learn; to be able to say in the latter that which you are able to say in the former. That part of Grammar which distinguishes one part of speech from another, which treats of the relationship of words, and which shows how, and under what circumstances, and for what purposes they change their form; this part of Grammar is called ETYMOLOGY. When, therefore, I shall, in Letters from V. to XII. inclusive, have gone through the Etymology of all the parts of speech, taking care to keep constantly before you the difference between the French and English languages, I shall, in Letter XIII., give you some Exercises, in order to fix firmly in your memory the nature and properties of each of the parts of speech. I shall next go to the Syntax, or the putting of words into sentences. But before I do this, I shall stop you a little, to learn the Genders of Nouns, and the Conjugations of Verbs. introduce this great mass of matter at an earlier period would cause such great interruptions, that your study of Etymology would be broken into parcels, separated by chasms much too wide. Yet this mass of matter must not be passed over; it must be encountered and mastered before you proceed to the Syntax. matter will be the subject of Letter XIV.; and then, from Letter XV. to Letter XXVIII. both inclusive, I shall give you the Syntax; or, as I described it before, that part of Grammar which teaches us how to put words into sentences. Here also I shall take the parts of speech one by one, from the Article to the Conjunction; and at the end of my observations and rules relative to each, I shall give you an Exercise; that is to say, a list of sentences, each, of which will contain some word, or words, bringing into practice the rules and instructions just given you. These Exercises will consist of English sentences to be put into French; for as to putting French into English, you will do that pretty well by the time that you get to Letter XIII. To put the English into French will be no easy matter; but, then, I shall lead you along so gradually, the sentences will be so short and so simple at first, and from the first Exercise to the twentieth (for there will be twenty), I shall make the previous one so effectually smooth the way to its successor, that I hope you will find no difficulties which steady application will not speedily overcome. In the framing of these Exercises I have not put part of the French under the English, because experience has taught me that the best way is to give the Euglish only, and let the scholar put the whole of the French as well as he can. I still persist in the same opinion, and pursue the same method in this new edition. But as I have now attained my aim with regard to yourself, I comply with the wish of several of my other readers, by publishing at the same time a complete Book of Exercises with a Key, and put the English under the French, for the use of those who, less industrious than yourself, do not relish the trouble of looking for every word in the Dictionary. I shall avoid Notes and every other thing calculated to draw off, or to enfeeble your attention. I shall not tease you with Exceptions beyond what utility demands. I shall not call you off from a rule to read a note of half a page on exceptions relating to words which you might perhaps never see in use four times in your life. I shall leave these things to those persons who are fond of curiosities, and shall be content to assist you in the acquiring of that which is useful. I shall, in the giving of my instructions, make use of the plainest language; I shall endeavour to express myself in the clearest manuer, and shall-avoid everything which shall appear to me likely to bewilder you or to make you wearv. In short, I shall talk to you in the most familiar manner; I shall give you reasons for doing that which I tell you ought to be done. I shall write you Letters that I hope you would not think very dull, though they were formed into a book merely to read through.

17. But there is the speaking of French. It is something, and a great deal too, to be able to read French; it is more to be able to translate it into English; it is still more to be able to translate English into French; but there is still the speaking of French, which is, as to this matter, the great, general, practical, and desired talent. Mind, however, that in the acquiring of this talent, this great accomplishment, you are got full ninetenths of the way, when you have learned to translate (upon paper) English into French. I mean, of course, to translate well, and with facility. When you have carried your acquisition thus far, there remains nothing but the sound, and it is quite surprising how quickly the ear and the tongue do their part of the business. When, however, we reflect, the reasons are plain enough. It is sound that is to be acquired; and where we, take the day through, can possibly write one word, we hear and utter thousands. Still, to learn the sound, you must hear it. To acquire a proper pronunciation of French (or of any foreign language) is absolutely impossible without practice; without hearing others speak, and without speaking to those who are able to correct you when you pronounce badly. Sounds admit not of being described upon paper. I shall, under the head of Prosody, in Letter III., prove to you that it is impossible for any human being to give written rules that can be of any use in teaching you how to pronounce French words. But though, in order to learn to speak French, you must have the assistance of a teacher, or must live among, or be a good deal among, those who speak that language, :till, as I said before, the task is nine-tenths performed, when you have acquired all that the Grammar will teach you. But it is not necessary for you to go through the Grammar before you begin to learn to pronounce; that is to say, if you liave a teacher, or any one to instruct you in reading. You may, after you have got well into the Grammar, be learning to pronounce words at the same time that you are learning the principles of the language. How you are to proceed in doing this, what you are to read, and other particulars relative to this matter, you will find mentioned in Letter III.

18. The general error of those who attempt to learn French is, that the moment they have begun to study, they want to get to reading French books, to translating and to speaking. And this is very natural, because it seems like having actually got possession of part of the thing so anxiously sought after. But this is going too fast: it is haste, but not speed. The best way is to go patiently through the Grammar, as far as the end of Letter XIII., before you attempt to read or to pronounce, even if you have a teacher. Your manner of proceeding ought to be this: read Letter III. ten times over, and then write it twice over. Go on thus to the end of Letter XIII. By the time that you have advanced thus far, which will be in about a month from the time that you begin, you will find that you have learned a great deal. You will begin to see your way through that, which, at the outset, appeared to be utterly impenetrable. You will, therefore, have courage to proceed with the remaining Letters in the same way, reading ten times and writing down twice. But here you will have Exercises. These, being merely English sentences for you to translate, need not be read till you come to translate them. When you have read ten times and copied twice the Letter, for instance, on the Syntax of Articles, you will translate the Exercises in that Letter. Thus you will proceed to the end. Particular instructions relative to the manner of going on in translating you will find in Letter XIV., just before you begin this part of your labours.

19. After you have gone through the whole of the rules and instructions, and have translated the whole of the Exercises, and have done this well, you will, of course, know how to write French tolerably well. Vcry easy will it be to learn to speak after this. But if you, too impatient to go thoroughly into the subjects of your Grammar, hasten on to reading and to speaking without knowing any thing of the principles of the language, you will, in all probability, never speak French much better than an English footman, or lady's maid, who has been for a while in France. The first and the main thing is the Grammar; that well learned, the rest is easy; but that imperfectly learned, the remainder of your way is full of difficulty, and you never arrive at any thing approaching towards perfection. There are persons enough able to utter, or to put upon paper, sentences of broken French; to ask people how they do, to talk of the weather, to call for victuals and drink; but this is not being a French Scholar; and I hope that nothing short of meriting this appellation will satisfy you. I shall slur nothing over. I know what were the difficulties the most troublesome to me. I remember the parts of the Grammar which were to me the most abstruce, and which it cost me the most time to be able to understand. These parts, therefore, I shall take particular pains to make plain and easy to you. In short, on my part, no effort shall be wanting; and let me hope that none will be wanting on yours.

OF LANGUAGE AND OF GRAMMAR GENERALLY, AND OF THE DIFFERENT BRANCHES, OR DIVISIONS, OF GRAMMAR.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

20. In pursuance of what I have said in paragraph 15, I am now about to explain to you what Language and Grammar are in a general sense.

21. Language is a French word as well as an English one. We take it, like a great many other of our words, from the French. Langue, in French, means tongue; and Language means, if fully stated, the things belonging to the tongue, or the things about which the tongue is employed, which things are words.

22. Grammar is a science which teaches us how to make use of words in a proper manner; for without some principle, or rule, in the using of words, we should have no standard whereby to ascertain their meaning. The main principles of Grammar apply to all languages alike; and this you will, in the next Letter, see fully illustrated in my account of the different Parts of Speech, or Sorts of Words.

23. But, before I enter on this matter, I must speak of the different Branches, or Divisions, of Grammar; for we must approach our subject by degrees and in a regular manner, and clearly understand what we are talking about, or we go on in vain. Grammar is usually divided into four Branches, which are thus named: Orthography, Prosody, Etymology, and Syntax.

24. ORTHOGRAPHY means spelling or word-making; and the rules relating to it merely touch us what letters different words are to be composed of. He divides the letters into Vowels and Consonants. This is so very simple a matter, that it will be only necessary to add, under this head, a few remarks as to the difference between the English Alphabet (or set of letters) and that of the French. The French alphabet has no K and no W. It has all the rest of our letters; and it has none that our alphabet has not. But though there be no K and no W used in the French language, the French use these letters when they have to write the proper names of persons or places which contain these letters; as Kingston, or Winchester; because, if they were to put any other letter, or letters, in lieu of the K and W, they, in fact, would not be understood as speaking of the same places. Nevertheless, they do take this liberty in certain cases; for they call Warsaw Varsovie. They have, then, twenty-four letters in their alphabet. They are written and printed in the same form that ours are.

A. a.	J. i.	R. r.
B. b.	J. j.	S. s.
C. c.	L. Ì.	T. t.
D. d.	M. m. •	U. u.
Е. е.	N. n.	V. v.
F. f	(). o.	X. x.
G. g.	P. p.	Y. y.
H. ĥ. '	$\mathbf{Q}, \hat{\mathbf{q}},$	Z. z.

Of these the a, e, i, o and u are Vowels, and also the y, which the French call the y Gree, that is to say, Greek. The other letters are, as with us, consonants. The letters are written and printed like ours, except in the case of the c, which has sometimes what they call a cédille to it, thus, g; and then it is sounded like an English s. As to the spelling of words properly, or putting the right letters into them, there can be no rule given. It is a thing to be acquired by practice only. In case of words which are derived from other words, the right spelling of the former will arise from a knowledge of the latter: thus, in our language, hairy naturally enough comes from hair; but, what reason can be given why hair should not be spelled hare, instead of hair? The best, the shortest, and indeed the only way of learning to spell all the words of a language correctly, is to write them many times over. Nothing fixes words in the mind like putting them upon paper. The eye is a much better remembrancer than the ear, and the hand is a still better than the eye. For this reason it is that I always recommend a great deal of writing. But, before I quit this head, I must notice the stops (or points), the marks and the accents; for these really make part of language as much as letters do. Some of those which I am going to give an account of here are used in both languages; but there are some of them which you will find are used in French and not in English.

Points. These are four in number: the comma (,), la virgule; the semicolon (:), le point et la virgule; the colon (:), deux points; the full point (.), le point.

MARKS. The mark of interrogation (!); that of admiration (!); that of parenthesis (); that of quotation ("). All the other marks, such as "\pm \pm \sqrt \mathbb{g} \| \mathbb{T}, are merely used for the purpose of directing the eye of the reader to some note, or other matter to be referred to by direction of the writer.

The foregoing are common to both languages. Those which follow are not used in English, except the hyphen and the elision; and these are not used by us for purposes at all resembling those for which they are, in numerous cases, used by the French.

ACCENTS AND MARKS peculiar to the French. The hyphen (-), as in vient-il? Is he coming? The elision ('), as in c' in c'est lui, and in thousands of instances. The cedilla, or cédille, I have mentioned before. It is the tail to the c, thus (c). The diaresis ("), called trêma, in French; it serves to part two vowels, which, joined together, would form a diphthong. Then there are the acute accent ('), the grave (') and the circumflex accents (^). These last are things of great importance; for des and dès are different words; so are a and à, la and là, ou and où, du and dû. These accents, therefore, must be attended to very carefully.

MUTE LETTERS. The e is called mute in some cases, and so is the h: that is to say, when they are not sounded in speaking the words of which they make a part.

CAPITAL LETTERS. These are used at the beginning of every sentence, set off by a full-point; and at the beginning of all proper names. In some other cases also, according to the taste of the writer. There is no law of grammar regulating this matter. Custom does a good deal, and that prescribes the use of capitals in writing the names of the days of the week and the names of the months, and in many other cases.

25. PROSODY means neither more nor less than what is expressed by the more common and better understood word PRONUNCIATION; that is to say, the using of the proper sound and the employing of the duc length of time in the uttering of syllables and words. To lay down principles, or rules, in writing, relative to pronunciation, seems to be a thing absurd upon the very face of it; because no one letter, no combination of letters, has any fixed sound or measure; but varies, in both respects, with a great variety of circumstances. The sounds which some grammarians attempt to describe as being those of the several letters of the French alphabet, are, in fact, by no means perfect, and are only the sounds in certain cases. In other cases they are Indeed, it is impossible to write rules that can be of any real use, relative to the sound of letters. No man can describe, by writing, the different sounds of our th; and when you are told that the word Français is to be pronounced Frawnsey, or nearly so, of what use is it to write you down the sounds of the a, the i, and the s? When you are told, that the word parleraient is to be pronounced parlercy, or as nearly as possible to that, what use can there be in giving you the sounds of the a, the i, the e, the n, and the t? Again, perdreaux is pronounced peardro. It is, therefore, worse than a waste of time to attempt to give written rules relative to the promuciation of individual letters; because such an attempt, while it cannot assist the learner, may, and indeed must, tend to mislead him. Non has the same combination of letters the same sound in all cases. The variances, in this respect, are numerous. There are nearly a thousand words in the French language, which are very nearly the same in sound, but different in their letters. There are many words, each of which may mean different things; and some of them have one sound in one sense, and another sound in another sense. In short, to speak French in a manner at all resembling that of French people, or, indeed, in a manner to be understood by them, you must learn from the month of some one or more who can speak the language. In default of other assistance, there must be a teacher for this purpose. To understand what you read in French, and, of course, to translate from French into English; to write French words, and to put them properly into sentences, and, of course, to translate from English into French: these you may be able to do without a teacher, though not nearly so speedily as with one. But to speak, free from ludierous impropriety, without the assistance of the speaking of others, is absolutely impossible. You ought never, until you have been taught to pronounce, or except there be a teacher at your elbow, to attempt to pronounce a French word; for, having pronounced it viciously four or five times, it is hard to get rid of the bad habit. To speak French any thing like well, you must be taught to open the mouth much wider than we, English, generally, or, indeed, ever do. The French say of us, that we bite our words; that is to say, that we speak with our upper and lower teeth nearly close to each other. If we do not break ourselves of this, we never speak French even tolerably well. The harshness of our language leads us, in speaking, to slide over great numbers of our words, giving to each only a part, and sometimes a very small part, of its full pronunciation. This habit we naturally fall into in reading and in speaking French, unless we be, at the outset, kept constantly on our guard against it; and this sliding over is what the French language will by no means bear. The result of these remarks is, that, though, as far as the understanding of what we read in French, and as far as the writing of French, go, much may be done without any other assistance than that of books; but that, as to speaking with any degree of propriety, it never can be acquired without the aid of the speaking of others. When, however, we come to speak, then we find all the advantages of what we have learned from the Grammar; for then we know what words to use and how to place them; which, without the study of Grammar, we can never know, constitutes the difference between the scholar and his footman, both being of the same age, and both having the same opportunities of hearing French spoken. But, if the scholar have begun by pronouncing erroneously; if he have gone on, for even a little while, giving his English sounds to French words, it is ten to one that the footman, though he know not his letters, will, all his life time, pronounce better than the scholar; because he will never have been misled. The age at which we begin to pronounce, is not of so much importance as is beginning properly, whenever we do begin. Some imagine that we can never speak French well unless we begin when very young. This is not the fact; I was twentysix years old when I began to speak French; and, in less than six months, French people used to take me for To be sure, they are apt to stretch a a Frenchman. point or two on the side of civility; but I really did speak the language tolerably well at the end of less than six months; and I ascribed this to my not having attempted to pronounce until I had competent assistance. In paragraph 17, I told you that I should, in this place. give you some instructions how to proceed in learning to read French. There will be no necessity for my giving you any matter merely to read, and to learn to pronounce from; for what can be so good for thir purpose as the lists of Articles and of the words of other parts of speech, which words will necessarily be inserted in lists, or tables, of this Grammar? Your first lesson in reading would be the Articles in Letter V. Your next, the Pronouns in Letter VII. The several classes of Prononns would give you so many lessons in reading; and, observe, these words are short, and they occur in almost every sentence. You would next read, many times over, the verbs avoir and être. You would then read the other verbs. Then the lists of Prepositions and Conjunctions in Letters XI, and XII. Then come back to the Nouns and Adjectives in Letters VI. and And after this there will be, at the end of the Grammar, all the twenty Exercises translated into French; and I shall take care that these Exercises contain one, at least, of each class of words of difficult pronunciation.

26. ETYMOLOGY means the pedigree or relationship of words. The word write, for instance, expresses an action which we perform with our hands; but, in some cases we have to say wrote, in others written, in others writing. Yet it is always the same action that is expressed; and therefore the words, though different as to the letters of which they are composed, spring from the same root and have a relationship to each other. Etymology teaches the principles and rules according to which the spelling of words is to be varied or altered: it teaches us when we ought to use write, when written, and so on. You will bear in mind that the general principles of Grammar are the same in both languages; but as to this business of varying the spelling of the words proceeding from the same root, it is, as you will by-and-by find, much more extensive in French than in English. This word write, for instance, is, in one case, écrire, but, in others, it becomes écris, écrit, écrivons, écrivez, écrivent, écrivais, écrivait, écrivions, écrivîmes, écrivirent; and takes many other forms. The rules of Etymology teach us when we ought to make use of one of these forms, and when of the other. You must, therefore, see at once, that this Branch of the seience is of great importance; and you must also see, that it is impossible to acquire any knowledge of the French language much beyond that which the capacity of a pairot would reach, without that sort of study upon which you are now entering. Etymology you will, in the next Letter, find dividing itself into several distinct parts. I have here aimed at giving you merely a general description of its nature and use.

27. SYNTAX means sentence-making. Etymology teaches us how to vary the forms of our words, how to make them agree or correspond with each other; it teaches us, for instance, to say he writes, and I write, and to avoid saying he write and I writes. But there remains something more than this to enable us to write or speak properly; because, not only must we use the proper words, but we must give to each word its proper situation, its proper place in a sentence or collection of words. Suppose, for instance, I were to say, "There is a prin-"eiple in this science, from which we must never depart." There would be a doubt whether it were the principle or the science that must be adhered to; but place the words thus: "There is, in this science, a principle, "from which we must never depart," and you know that it is the principle to which we have to adhere. Therefore, even in the use of our own language, the rules of Syntax are of great use; but, in the learning of Freuch, they are of indispensable necessity; for, without a tolerably large stock of knowledge with regard to them, we never can arrive at anything approaching to perfection in the language. The words, though the same in meaning, do not follow the same order, in the two languages. For instance: He has ten white hens. French of this is, Il a dix poules blanches. That is to say, word for word, he has ten hens white. And, bad as this sounds in English, it does not sound worse than dix blanches poules would in French. I give you this merely as a specimen, and to explain to you the nature of what is ealled Suntax, for the want of duly studying the principles and rules of which, the French hear so many English speaking broken French, and we hear so many French speaking broken English.

28. I have now spoken to you of Language and of Grammar in general, and described to you the different Branches, or Divisions, of the latter. You will bear in mind, that we have nothing further to do with ORTHOGRAPHY, except that we must always remember what has been said towards the close of paragraph 24. You will also bear in mind, that you are not to attempt to meddle with PROSODY, or Pronunciation, unless at the stage, and under the cirstances, already fully mentioned. We have now to enter on the study of Etymology, which is, indeed, the most important part of our undertaking. Let me beg of you to proceed steadily on: not to be in haste; not to be impatient: and, if you follow this advice, you will soon have reason to be proud of what you have learned.

LETTER IV.

ETYMOLOGY:

THE DIFFERENT PARTS OF SPEECH, OR SORTS OF WORDS.

MY DEAR RICHARD.

29. ETYMOLOGY has been described to you in the foregoing Letter. It treats, as you have seen, of the relationship of words, of which you have seen an example in paragraph 26. Treating, then, of the relationship of words, it first divides the words into several distinct sorts, as we would plants for a garden, before we begin to place them in rows or clumps. You will, by-and-by, see the use of this; but, in the present Letter, I have to describe to you these several different sorts of words, which grammarians call Parts of Speech, and which they name thus:

english.	FRENCII.
Articles.	Articles.
Nouns,	Noms,
Pronouns.	Pronoms,
Adjectives,	Adjectiss,
Verbs.	Verbes.
Adverbs.	. Adverbes.
Prepositions,	Prépositions,
Conjunctions,	Conjonctions,
Interjections.	Interjections.

30. These names are so much alike in both languages that you will be apt to suppose that the languages themselves differ, throughout, very little from each other; but these are words taken from the more ancient into both these modern languages, whence comes the close resemblance in this particular case. You will observe, that, to whatever Part of Speech any English word belong, the French word which has the same meaning belongs also; it is the same sort of word in both languages, just as a tulip is the same sort of flower, whether it grow in a French or in an English garden. Thus the word tree is, in French, arbre. The word tree is a name, and the word arbre also.

- 31. I shall, by-and-by, have to tell you things of this sort; namely, that, in French, you must, in certain cases, place the pronoun before the verb, and not after it as in English. For instance: John gives you a pen. You must write Jean vous donne une plume: that is, John you gives a pen: and not, Jean donne rous une plume. "In short, I shall be continually talking to you about Aricles, Nouns, and the rest of these Parts of Speech. My instructions will, indeed, consist of rules relative to how you ought to write and how you ought to place Articles, Nouns, Pronouns, and the rest of the sorts of words. It is, therefore, as you will clearly see, necessary that you know, as soon as possible, how to distinguish one sort of words from another. To enable you to do this, or, rather, to open the matter to you, the remaining paragraphs of the present Letter are intended.
- 32. ARTICLES. In English there are but two, namely, the and a. Before a vowel, or an h mute, a becomes an; but it is only another shape for the same word. There being then only the and a, no further explanation is necessary in order to distinguish our Articles from the other Parts of Speech. With the French, however, the matter is not so easy; for though they have only two Articles, le and un, these, and particularly the former, frequently change their form; the former unites itself so very oddly with prepositions; and both consist of the same letters of which words of other Parts of Speech consist; so that it is a matter of great importance to distinguish them from those other Parts of Speech. Articles are little words put before other words: as, the stick, a horse; in French, le bâton, un cheval.

- 33. NOUNS. The word noun means name, and nothing more. Every word that stands for, or that speaks to us of, anything (alive or dead), that has a substance, such as we can see, is a noun; as man, tree, fire; whence some grammarians call this sort of words substantices. But there are other nouns; as pride, truth, conscience, thought, misery, distress, pleasure, jay, and the like, which have no substance, and therefore substantive is an inadequate appellation. Every word that expresses anything that has an existence or being, is a noun; and more complete than this it is impossible to make our definition.
- 34. PRONOUNS. This word is composed of two Latin words, which mean for and names. So that Pronouns stand for nonns. Thus he is a Pronoun, because we say, John was ill, but HE is now well. So, also, which is a Pronoun, because we say, the horses which you bought are good. There are many pronouns and many important rules relating to them; but I am in this place endeavouring merely to give you some idea of what this Part of Speech is.
- 35. ADJECTIVES. The word Adjective, in its literal sense, means something added. In Grammar it means a word added to a noun, in order to express something belonging to it which it is necessary for us to know. For instance: send me a BLUE coat. If I had no Adjective whereby to express the colour, I should be able to say merely that I wanted a coat. In French, this phrase would be, envoyez-moi un habit BLEU. That is to say, send me a coat blue, and not a blue coat; and though it would be shockingly bad English to say coat blue, it would not be less bad French to say bleu habit. You will by-and-by find rules about placing the Adjectives, which are, in some eases, to come before, and in others after, the Nouns; and therefore it is necessary to know, as soon as possible, how to distinguish Adjectives from other words. Words of this sort express the qualities of Nouns, as good, bad, indifferent; their appearances, as handsome, ugly; their dimensions, as long, short, shallow, deep, high, low; their colours, and various other circumstances belonging to them. If you take time to compare them with Nouns, you will soon discover the difference; for you will find that the Adjectives speak of what has no existence of itself. For instance, great. This is nothing of itself: but put it before the Noun man, joy, or the like, and it has sense in it.

36. VERBS express all the different actions and movements of all creatures or things, whether alive or dead. To walk, to speak, to grow, to moulder, to work, and the like. In these cases there is movement, either visible or understood. To love, to hate, to think, to remember, thengh the movement is not so readily perceived, we, on reflection, discover movements of the heart and mind. But to sit, to sleep, to rot, are also verbs; for they describe states of being, states in which things are; and, therefore, they are verbs. Verbs are, then, words, the use of which is to express the actions, the movements, and the state or manner of being of all creatures or things, whether animate or inanimate. In paragraph 31, I gave you an instance of the necessity of being able to distinguish one part of speech from another. I said that, I should have to instruct you to put, in certain eases, the pronoun before the verb, and not after it, as in English. It was this: Jean vous donne une plume. That is, word for word, John vou gives a pen. Vous is the pronoun and donne the verb. But when I lay down a rule like this, it can be of no use to you, unless you know what words are pronouns and what words are verbs. You see, therefore, how necessary it is to know how to distinguish one part of speech from another, and each part from all the rest.

- 37. ADVERBS are so called because they are added to verbs; but this is not an adequate description of their use; for they are as frequently otherwise employed. They are, indeed, added to verbs, as, he writes neatly. Writes is the verb, and neatly the adverb. But there are many adverbs which are not added to verbs; but that express, or point out, time, place, and degree. Their business is to express some circumstance in addition to all that is expressed by the Nouns, Adjectives, and Verbs; as, He writes a Very good hand. We, without the Adverb very, know that he writes, and that he writes a good hand: but the adverb is necessary to inform us, that this goodness is in a high degree.
- 38. PREPOSITIONS are so called because their position is generally before, or previous to, that of the Nouns to which they apply. They are the little words in, to, for, from, of, by, with, and several others. The French words, which answer to these and the rest of our Prepositions, are, you will bear in mind, Prepositions in that language also. This is a class of words, few in number, and soon distinguished from all others.

- 39. CONJUNCTIONS have this name given them, because they conjoin, or join together, words, or parts of sentences; as, Richard and William write; but they do not ride. Thus you see the word and joins together Richard and William, and by the means of this junction, makes the word write apply to them both. The word but connects the two parts of the sentence: and thus does every part of the sentence apply to the two Nouns that are the subject of it.
- 40. INTERJECTIONS. This name arises from two Latin words, which mean something thrown between. The Interjections are Oh! Ah! Alas! Poh! and some others, which are, indeed, not words; they make no part of what we call language; they are mere sounds, and ought not to be reckoned a Part of Speech any more than hissing, hooting, erging, coughing, or sneezing, ought to be reckoned such. The French say, for instance, Bah! where we say Poh! It is all mere noise, wholly unworthy of our attention, and has been mentioned by me only for the purpose of expressing my disapprobation of the conduct of those who have considered it a Part of Speech.
- 41. Even the most attentive study of the contents of this Letter will not enable you to know, in all cases, what Part of Speech a word belongs to. To obtain this knowledge in perfection is a work of time, steady pursuit, and patience. Your understanding of what you have now read will, at first, be confused; and you will, at times, be ready to think that you shall never succeed in your object. But you must take heart, and remember what I said before, that nothing valuable can be honourably gained without labour of some sort or other. You should also bear in mind, that in proportion to the greatness of the difficulty of your undertaking is the smallness of the number of those who overcome it. In war the maxim is, the greater the danger the greater the glory; in learning, it is according to the labour that the meed is apportioned.

- 42. Let me, before I put an end to this Letter, give you an instance of a sentence, in which you will find words belonging to all the Parts of Speech; thus, the brown horse and the gray mare which ran swiftly in the field. The word the is an Article; horse, mare, and field, are Nouns; which is a Pronoun; ran is a Verb; swiftly is an Adverb; in is a Preposition; and is a Conjunction. In order to try yourself a little, it is a very good way to take any sentence in a book, and to write down on a piece of paper, against each word, the part of Speceli which you think it belongs to: then look for the words, one by one, in the Dictionary. You find an a against Articles; s against Nonns, because they are also called Substantives; adj. against Adjectives; pro. against Pronouns; v. a. against Verbs Active; v. n. against Verbs Neuter; adv. against Adverbs; prep. against Prepositions; and con. against Conjunctions. These marks are the same in the French as in the English Dictionary, except that in the ease of Nouns, or Substantives, you will, in the French, find, besides the s, an m or an f; that is to say, masculine or feminine; because, as you will find by and by, every French Noun is either masculine or feminine, which makes one of the great differences between that language and ours.
- 43. One thing more relative to the Parts of Specch you ought here to be informed of; namely, that what one would eall the same word often belongs to two Parts of Speech. For instance, I RECORD a deed. Here record is a Verb; but in, I put the deed upon RECORD, the same word is a Noun. In truth, however, it is not the same word: it is the same assemblage of letters, but not the same word; nor, indeed, has it the same sound. In French le is sometimes an Article, and at others a Pronoun. It is thus with a great number of words in both languages. It is their meaning, and not merely the letters of which they are composed, that determines the Part of Speech to which they belong.

LETTER V.

ETYMOLOGY OF ARTICLES.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- 44. Before you enter on this Letter, look again at paragraph 32. You there see, that, in our language, we have only two articles, a and the. The first sometimes, as you saw, becomes an; but, it is still the same word, the difference in the spelling being merely for the purpose of harmony of sound. This is called the indefinite article, because a noun, when it has this article prefixed to it, only serves to point out the kind of person or thing spoken of, without defining what person or what thing; as, A horse is dead. But, when we say, The horse is dead, we speak of some particular horse known to the person to whom we are speaking. The the is, therefore, called the definite article.
- 45. The use of our own articles is so well known to ourselves, that it will be innecessary to enlarge upon that here: my chief business in this place is to teach you the manner of using the French articles, which are also two in number, un and le, answering to our a and the; but, as you are now going to see, these two French articles assume many forms, and some of these very different from the forms in which you here see them. The first of them is, as with us, called the indefinite article, and the other the definite; and they are used, of course, according to the principle stated in paragraph 44.
- 46. The indefinite article un ois, then, put before nouns which merely point out the kind of the person or thing spoken of; as, un livre, a book. But, here we begin to see the difference in the two languages; for every noun in French is either of the masculine or the feminine gender, and the article varies in its form, that is to say, in its spelling, to correspond with the gender of the noun to which it is prefixed. Un is the masculine, and une the feminine, of this indefinite article; so that we must say, un livre, a book; but we must say, une plume, a peu, because livre is masculine and plume feminine.

47. This is the only variation of form to which, as an article, this word is liable. But, the same word, or rather the same assemblage of letters, is not always an article. It is sometimes an adjective; that is to say, when it expresses number, answering to our one; for the French say, an, deux, trois, as we say one, two, three: and this is the reason why we hear French people say one man, and the like, when they should say a Not having learned English grammatically, they confound the article with the adjective. It is the same word, or rather the same assemblage of letters in their language, but it is not the same in ours. Besides this, the un is sometimes a pronoun, in like manner as our one is; as, neither the ONE nor the other. In French, ni I'un ni l'autre. But, here is a further variation to agree with the number as well as with the gender of the nouns. If, in the example just given, we are speaking of livres, books, which are masculine, we say ni l'un ni l'autre; if of plumes, pens, which are feminine, we say ni l'une ni l'autre; if of parcels of books, we say, ni les UNS ni les autres; and if of parcels of pens, ni les unes ni les autres; while, you will observe, we have, in the use of our one, no variations of this sort, unless, indeed, that we do sometimes say, good ones, bad ones, and the I have here got out of my subject; for I am not now to talk of adjectives and pronours; but the French un, which answers to our article a, being sometimes an adjective and sometimes a pronoun, I was obliged to mention that circumstance here.

- 48. Though the paragraph which you have just read anticipates a little; though it does not, strictly speaking, belong to the etymology of articles, it may serve to prevent you from confounding this indefinite article with the adjective, or the pronoun composed of the same letters. The 46th paragraph concludes the subject of the indefinite article; and now we come to the definite article, which, as you have been told, is le, answering to our the.
- 49. Our definite article is, in all cases, the same. It never changes its form at all. Whatever may be the noun before which it is placed, it is always composed of the same letters. It is always the. Whereas the French definite article takes, according to circumstances, all the following different forms: le, la, l', les, du, des, au, aux. In the four last forms the word is a compound: it is an article united with the prepositions de, of, and à, to. Thus, du means de le, of the, in the singular; des means deles, of the, in the plural; au means à le, to the, in the singular; and aux ancans à les, to the, in the plural. And here you perceive that what is expressed by a single word in one language, requires two words in the other. This you will find to be frequently the case.
- 50. However, this is sufficient about the article at present, because, in order clearly to understand the rules relative to the use of it; in order to understand when one of these forms is to be used, and when the other, you must first learn something about the branches, genders, numbers, and cases of nouns, and this you will learn from the next Letter.

LETTER VI.

ETYMOLOGY OF NOUNS.

My DEAR RICHARD,

- 51. In paragraph 33, I have described what a Noun is; that is to say, what are the marks by which you are to distinguish Nouns from words belonging to other Parts of Speech. You must now read that paragraph again, for you are now entering on the Etymology of this Part of Speech; and you have seen in paragraph 26 (which you will now read again), that Etymology teaches us the principles and rules according to which we are to vary the form or spelling of words.
- 52. In a Noun there are to be considered the Branches, the Genders, the Numbers, and the Cases; and these must all be carefully attended to.
- 53. THE BRANCHES. Nouns are divided into Proper and Common. The proper are such as are the names of particular individuals, as, Richard, London, England. The Common are the names of all the individuals of a kind, as, Man, City, Country. There are. indeed, many men named Richard, and there is a London and an England in America; but these names are not applicable to all men, all cities, and all coun-Though many pointers go by the same name, such as Don, yet this is not a common Noun, like pointer, or dog, the first of which is applicable to all pointers, and the last applicable to all dogs. Such are the two Branches of Nouns; and this, simple as it appears, is a matter for you to attend to, because you will find, by-and-by, that the manner of using the other words which are employed with Nouns, will depend upon whether the Nouns themselves be proper or common; and this is the ease to a much greater extent in French than it is in English. Proper Nouns are always, in all languages, made to begin, whether in manuscript or in print, with a capital letter, as in this sentence: Richard knows several of the Men who live in the most of our cities, but he knows only Thomas in that of Bristol. We do, indeed, employ capital letters in some other cases, of which I shall say more in another place; but we always employ them at the beginning of proper nouns.

54. THE GENDERS. Here we come to that which forms one of the great differences in the two languages. In our language, the Nouns, or names, of males are masculine; those of females are feminine; and those of inanimate things, or of creatures the sex of which we do not know, are neuter. Thus, in speaking of a man, we say he; of a woman, she; of a house, it. In speaking of living creatures, the sex of which we do not know, we use the neuter gender; for though we call a cock a he, and a hen a she, we call a fowl an it. In speaking of a child, we say it; but this is only when we do not know whether the child be a male or a female. We do, indeed, in a sort of figurative way, sometimes call irrational animals hes; for instance, when we are speaking of birds or beasts as a race, and when we use the singular number instead of the plural; as, the lark sings well; the horse is a useful animal; that is to say, larks sing well, horses are useful animals. Now, if we have in this case to use the pronoun, we very frequently say he (the lark) sings, well; he (the horse) is a useful animal. Some few birds and beasts and insects, we, when we speak thus figuratively, call shes. But neither being strictly grammatical, there can be no rule about the matter. We generally call the owl a she! This is all mere accident; and he would be as proper; because neither is proper, strictly speaking.

55. How different the French language as to this matter! In French every Noun is of the masculine or of the feminine, whether it be the name of a living creature or not. The names of living creatures that are males are, indeed, of the masculine gender, and those that are the names of females are of the feminine gender; but the names of all other things are either masculing or feminine. Panier (basket), for instance, is masculine; and table (table) feminiue. This would be nothing, if it were merely ealling them masculine and femiuine. But the articles, the adjectives, and the pronouns must vary their form, or spelling, to agree with the genders of the nouns. We say the basket, the table; but the French say le panier, and la table. We say, the round basket, the round table; but they must say, le panier rond, and la table ronde. We say, speaking of a basket, it is round, and we say the same of a table: but they say, speaking of a basket, it est roud, and speaking of a table, elle est ronde.

56. Thus, you see, it is absolutely necessary to know what gender a moun is of before you use it. If I am speaking of wine, I must call it he (il); but if I am speaking of beer, I must call it she (elle). Now, then, how are we, when, we are about to use a noun, to know whether it be masenline or femiuine? How are we to come at this knowledge? In the Dictionary, as I observed in paragraph 42, you will find against every noun either s. m. or s. f. The former means Substantive (or Nonn) masculine, and the latter Substantive (or Nonn) feminine. And this, after all that Grammarians can do; after all the rules that they can give, is the only sure way of learning (from books) the Gender of the French Nouns. MONSIEUR RESTAUT, in his "General Principles of French Grammar," makes the Scholar put this question to the Master: "How are "we to know of what gender nowns are?" The answer of the master is this: "The nouns before which we can "put le or un are masculine, and the nouns before "which we can put la or une are feminine; as le livre, "un livre; la plume, une plume." This is very good for those who already know the cases which demand ' those different Articles respectively; but Monsieur RESTAUT does not tell others how they are to know it, which was the very thing that was wanted. Monsieur Restaut's rule for knowing the gender of Nouns is excellent for those who know the gender of Nouns, and quite useless to everybody else. But Monsieur Restaut was writing a Grammar of the French language for the use of French people, who had, from their infancy, heard the le put before some words, and the la before It is a very different matter when the learner is of another nation.

57. Are there any rules, then, by which we English people can know the gender of French nouns? There are; but so numerons are those rules, and so numerons the exceptions, that it is impossible for them to be of any use at all to the learner. The rules are ten or twelve in number; and the exceptions are many hundreds. The way which these rules point out for you to know the gender of a noun is, by looking at the termination or ending of it. Thus, for instance, one rule says, that nouns ending in ion are of the feminine gender; but there are from twenty to thirty exceptions to this one rule; and while you must say la nation, you must say le scorpion. There are more than three score different terminations, if you go back to the fourth letter from the end of the word. So that there might be three score rules, and even these must have, in the whole, many scores of exceptions. To show the folly of all attempts to reduce this matter to rule, we have only to know that there are more than a hundred nouns which are masculine in one sense and feminine in another sense. And, after all this, there come the numerous nouns ending in an e mute, or not sounded. Of this description of nouns there are, perhaps, many more than a thousand, and there are about as many of them of one gender as of the other. What, then, can Monsieur de Lévizac mean by the following words "The gender of nouns, in inanimate in his Grammar? "objects, is generally expressed by their terminations; "thus, final e mute is the distinctive mark of the " feminine gender, and every other final letter is the "sign of the masculine. This would be an excellent "rule were it universal, but this is far from being the "case." Far, indeed! For, in the first place, there are as many masculines as feminines with a final e mute. How, then, can the final e mute be the distinctive mark of the feminine gender? Then, of the nouns which end in eur, ion, and in some other letters, the greater part are feminines. How, then, can every final letter other than e mute be the sign of the masculine gender?

58. After this, Monsieur de Lévizac proceeds to lay down what he calls "concise rules," for ascertaining These "concise rules" occupy eight pages the gender. of print, and present a mass of perplexity, to unravel which would demand more time than would be required to write down all the nonns in the Dictionary with an article to each, and to get the whole by heart; and after all these eight pages of "concise rules," Monsieur DE LEVIZAC is compelled to leave all the nouns in final e mute to take their chance! Monsieur Chambaud has twenty-four rules, each with exceptions, and some with numerous exceptions; and, after all, he also leaves the nouns in final e mute nearly to take their chance. MONSIEUR PALAIRET, after giving five rules with their exceptions, comes to his sixth rule, which is, that nouns in final e mute are feminine, "except the following;" and then comes a list of about five hundred nouns, and even to these are to be added many which he says he has omitted "for shortness." Monsieur Porny, after giving nine rules with their exceptions, says that the "surest way is to refer to the Dictionary;" and yet he has, in a Note, this strange observation: "This advice "is not given on a pretence of the impossibility of "reducing the gender of our Nouns to rules, as a "certain Grammarian asserts; but on account that "there can be no rules drawn on this intricate subject "but what must be accompanied with many excep-"tions; and the whole, of course; would, perhaps, prove "more perplexing to beginners than instructive." Passing over the bad English of Monsieur Porxy, I agree with him that the attempt to reduce the gender of the French Norms to rules would be more perplexing than instructive; and I so well remember that the perplexity which I experienced from reading rules on this subject gave me such disgust, and was so near driving me away from the study of the language, that I shall take good care not to expose you to the effects of reading such rules.

- 59. Monsieur Yorny ealls this an intricate subject. It is by no means intricate, any more than would be the task of separating the grains of wheat from those of barley when mixed together in a sack. It is a matter of mere labour, with some memory, and requires no reflection, no reasoning, as in the case of distinguishing the Parts of Speech from each other. The subject is not, therefore, intricate; and though it requires labour, this is rendered wearisome and disgusting only by the vain attempts to subject it to rules.
- 60. You are not to encounter the whole of this labour yet; but I shall now give you some instructions how to proceed to know the gender of nouns, which, as you have already been informed, is a thing of indispensable necessity to the learning of French.
- 61. In the first place, all nouns that are masculine in English are masculine in French, and it is the same with the feminines; that is to say, the names of all males are of the first, and the names of all females of the last. But if, as is observed in paragraph 54, the Noun relate to a living creature, and do not express the sex, then the Noun, in French, is masculine or feminine, as it may happen. Thus, corbean (raven) is masculine, and perdrix (partridge) is feminine; for these do not express the sex, but merely the kind. When the French Noun expresses the sex, as coq (coek), or poule (hen), it is masculine or feminine, as in our language. So far the French language follows the order of nature; but it has no neuter gender. It makes everything either a male or a female, as was explained in paragraph 55.

- 62. To the rule just given, and according to which the names of all males are of the masculine gender, and those of all females of the feminine gender, there are a few seeming exceptions, that I must notice, such as sentinelle, a sentinel; patrouille, the patrol; garde, a guard of soldiers; majesté, majesty; Saint Michel, the feast of St. Michael. But, in fact, it is not the men, but their office or occupation, and the feast of the Saint, that these French words, which are feminine, express.
- 63. I have one more remark to make before I come to my instructions how to proceed to know the genders of other nouns. Some words are of both genders; that is to say, they are sometimes of one and sometimes of the other. They, like some words in English, sometimes mean one thing and sometimes another. We, for instance, have jack, the name of a fish, and jack, to The French have livre, a book, and livre, a roast with. pound; and with them the first of these is masculine, and the other feminine; and, accordingly, we must say, le livre, in the first case, and la livre in the last. They have many of these words of double meaning; but the genders of these, as well as of all the rest, will soon be learned by the method that I am now going to point out, by telling you what I myself did in order to learn the genders.
- 64. I made a paper book, in the octavo form, and divided each page into three columns, by lines drawn down the page. Then I took the Dictionary, and wrote down all the Nouns in it. When I had filled the first column I began the next, and proceeded thus until I had written down all the Nouns in tho Dictionary. The Dictionary told me what gender each Noun was of, and I prefixed to it an Article, either indefinite or definite, corresponding with that gender. It took me about ten days to do this; and I had wasted weeks on the rules about genders without being able to make top or tail of the matter. When I had once written every Nonn with its Article, I had done a good deal. I then looked at this book of my own making forty or fifty times over; so that, in a few days, my eye, when I was translating from Euglish into French, told me almost instantly whether I was right or wrong as to the gender. If I had had a master to read to, and had read my book to him, the ear, as well as the eye, would have assisted me; but even without such aid I found, in a short time, very little difficulty with regard to the gender, which presents, beyond all comparison, the most laborious task that we have to perform in learning the French language.

- 65. But, as I observed just now, you are not yet to enter on this part of your undertaking. This practical part will come by-and-by; and then I shall have again to give you some instructions on the subject. I have here been explaining to you the nature of the genders, and showing you how the French language differs from ours in respect to them. I, therefore, now quit the genders and go to the Numbers.
- 66. NUMBERS. We may have to speak of persons and things that are collected together; that is to say, when there is more of them than one to be spoken of. The Noun must, then, have two Numbers, one to be used when we are speaking of a single person or thing, and the other when we are speaking of more than one. The Noun has two Numbers accordingly; the one called the singular, and the other the plural. The latter word means belonging to more. The singular belongs to one, the plural to more than one.

67. The next thing to be considered is, how the plural Noun is designated so as to be distinguished from the singular. This is generally done, in English, by adding an s to the singular; as day, days. And the very same is the general rule in Freuch; as chien, But, in both languages, there are some exceptions to this general rule. The exceptions are not very numerous; and may, with proper industry, be soon pretty well fixed in the mind. In English, when the singular Noun ends in ch, sh, s, or x, there requires es to be added to form the plural, as church, churches. A singular ending in y changes the y into ics to form the plural; as quality, qualities; but, if a vowel immediately precede the y, you only add an s; as day, days. Singulars ending in f generally change the f into ves to make the plural. Some few Nouns have their plural in n; as oxen. Some few Nouns have no singular number, and some have no plural; as tongs, and gold. Nouns expressing moral qualities and feelings have generally no plural; as honesty, meekness. Some few Nouns form their plural by changing several of the letters of which the singular is composed; as mouse, mice; goose, geese. And a few are the same words in both numbers; as deer and sheep.

68. Such is the case with regard to our English Nouns; and this is much about the case with the French Nouns. But, let me observe here, that the irregularity in one language is not found, except by mere chance, in the same word as in the other language.

There are Four Rules for forming the plurals of French Nouns; the first is the general rule; the rest form exceptions to it.

- Rule 1. The plural is formed by adding an s to the singular; as, chien, dog; chiens, dogs; diamant, diamond; diamants, diamonds; loi, law; lois, laws. This is the general rule; but tout and gent are exceptions, and change the t into s in the plural, as tous, all; gens, people.
- Rule 2. Nouns ending in s, x, or z, are the same in both numbers; as, un fils, a son; deux fils, two sons; le noix, the nut; les noix, the nuts; le nez, the nose; les nez, the noses.
- Rule 3. Nouns ending in au, eau, eu, oeu, icu, ou, form their plurals by taking an x, instead of an s; as, un chapeau, a hat; deux chapeaux, two hats; un chou, a cabbage; deux choux, two cabbages. But there are these exceptions with regard to nouns ending in ou; namely,

cou,		neck.	lt	fou,	fool.
clou,		nail.	- 1	hibou,	owl.
film,	- 1	pickpocket.	-	loup-garou,	a ferocious man.
licon		halter	- 11	•

- These follow the general rule, and make, in their plurals, cous, trous, clous, and so on.
- Rule 4. Nouns ending in al and ail change these letters into aux to form their plural; as, un mal, an evil; plusieurs maux, many evils; un travail, a work; plusieurs travaux, many works. But there are those exceptions as to nouns ending in al: bal, ball (or dance); pal, pale in heraldry; cal, callous skin; carnaval, carnival; régal, regale;

all which follow the general rule, and take simply an s for the formation of the plural; as, sen bal, a ball; trois bals, three balls, and so on. The following Nouns, ending in ail, follow the general rule, and form their plurals by adding an s to the singulars:

attirail, [splendid train.	gouvernail,	helm.
camail,	a priest's dress.	mail,	' mail.
détail,	detail.	portail,	portal.
éventail,	fan.	sérail,	• seraglio
épouvantail.	scarecrow.	travail,	travail.

Besides these rules, with their exceptions, it is to be observed that there are several nouns which have no plural, and several which have no singular; as, bonheur, happiness, and hardes, clothes. The names of different sorts of grain, of herbs, of flesh, and of metals, have seldom any plurals in either language; and the things which nature or art have made double, or in inseparable numbers, can seldom take nouns in the singular form. Then, there are some nouns so irregular as not to admit of being reduced to any thing like rule; as, wil, eye; yeux, eyes.

69. It would be useless to give lists of these here, because such lists could only tend to load the memory. The above rules are quite sufficient for all purposes connected with the formation of the plural of nouns. They are clear and short, and will, if written down by you several times, not fail to be a competent guide. You will observe, that it is unnecessary to swell out a book of this kind with matters that are fully explained in the Dictionary. If, for instance, you want to know what eye is in French, the Dictionary says æil; and lest you should think that the plural is formed by adding an s to the singular, the Dictionary tells you that the plural of wil is yeux. This is the true way of learning with respect to numbers and genders, all that cannot be reduced to short and certain rule. I must make a remark here relative to the manner of writing the above tables. The rules of grammar require that there should be a CAPITAL LETTER to begin the word which comes next after a full point. I have not observed this rule in the tables and conjugations, because it would have been, in some eases, inconvenient in point of space.

- 70. CASES. The word case, as used in teaching grammar, means state, situation, or position. A noun may be, at different times, in different states, or situations, with regard to other nouns in the same sentence. For instance, a norm may be the name of a man who strikes a horse, or of one who possesses a horse, or of one whom a horse kicks. These different situations or states are called cases. You will presently see the necessity of this division of the situations of nouns into cases; for you will find that articles, and some other words, used along with the nouns, vary their form to agree with the different cases of the nouns. Therefore this is a matter of great importance, and requires great care and attention.
- 71. In the Latin language each noun has several different endings, in order to denote the different cases in which it may be. In our language there is but one of the cases of nouns which is expressed, or denoted, by a change in the ending of the noun. In the French there is no such change to denote the case; and this you will see explained presently.
- 72. There are three cases; the Nominative, the Possessive, and the Objective. The word nominative means naming; the word possessive means relating to possession; the word objective means relating to objects.

CASES. 49

- 73. A nonn is in the Nominative case, when it names or points out a person or thing which does something, or is something; as, Richard strikes, Richard is good. And, observe, it is the same in French; as, Richard frappe, Richard est bon.
- 74. A noun is in the Possessive case when it denotes a person or thing which possesses some other person or thing, or when there is one of the persons or things belonging to the other; as, Richard's hat, the mountain's top, the nation's fleet. And here you see that change in the ending of our English nouns, spoken of in paragraph 71. But, observe, this change is not absolutely necessary. We may always do without it if we please; for, the hat of Richard is the same things as Richard's hat. In French there is no such change; there we say, le chapean de Richard, le haut de la montagne, la flotte de la nation.
- 75. A noun is in the Objective case, when the person or thing that it expresses or denotes is the object or end of some act, or of some movement; as, Richard strikes Peter; Richard gives a blow to Peter; Richard goes after Peter; falsehood leads to mischief; idleness is the nurse of vice. Here you see that all these nouns are in the objective case; that is to say, Peter, mischief, and vice, are the object, the end, or the effect, of something done or felt by some other person or thing, which is in the nominative case.
- 76. It would be useless to talk about these cases, seeing that the form or spelling of the noun is the same in all the cases; but when we come to the pronouns and verbs, you will soon find the necessity of attending very carefully to the cases of the nouns; that is to say, when we come to use the nouns along with the pronouns and the verbs; and this is, as you will find, more strikingly true in French than in English. But, before we come to them, we have to speak of the use of the definite article, the treating of which was, in paragraph 50, put off until we should come to the place where we now are.

77. Read Letter V. all through again carefully, and then proceed with me. You see that our definite Article, the, never changes its form, but that the Freuch Article, le, changes its form many times; and as we have now spoken of the branches, genders, numbers, and cases of Nouns, you will the better understand me as I describe the mode of varying the form of the Article; for, in French, the Article varies in its form to agree with these various circumstances in the Noun. Sometimes the French Article is used before proper names, and sometimes uot. We say France is a great kingdom; fire burns. But they say, La France est un grand royaume; le fen brûle. We say, speaking of mankind, Man: they say, l'Homme. This, however, will be fully explained by-and-by, and especially when we come to the Syntax, where we shall see how the Article is used in sentences: at present, I have only to show you how it varies its forms to agree with the nouns before which it is placed.

78. The Article must agree with the noun in gender. You have been told, in paragraph 55, that panier (basket) is masculine, and that table (table) is feminine. Now, then, of these two nouns the first takes the masculine article le, and the second the feminine article la. But this, you will observe, is only in the singular number; for, if the number be plural, the article is les, whether the noun be masculine or feminine. This is not, however, always the case; for if the noun begin with a vowel, or with an h mute (not sounded), the e, or the a_{\bullet} is omitted in the article, a mark of elision is put over the place of the e, or the a, and the l' is put before the singular nouns of both genders; as, l'oreiller, the pillow, which is masculine; and l'ame, the soul, which is feminine. These four nouns take the article as follows:

The h mute is, in this respect, like the vowels. L'heure (hour), which is feminine, and l'honneur (honour), which is masculine, both take the article in the same form; but if the h be not mute, that is to say, if it be sounded in speaking, you must put the le or the la agreeably to the gender; as, le hibou (the owl), and la hache (the axe). But, observe, that, in all instances, the article for the plural is les.

79. We are now going to see how this definite French article unites itself with the little words de (of) and à (to). In paragraph 49 I have called it, when thus used, a compound. De and \(\lambda\) are prepositions, as you have seen in paragraph 38, which you will now look at again. De sometimes means from, and \(\delta\) sometimes has a meaning different from that of to; but, used before nouns, they generally answer to our of and to. In speaking of a basket, instead of saying, de le pauier, we must say du panier; thus, this one word du answers to our two words of the. But if we are using a noun of the feminine gender, we must not say, du, but de la. Then, again, if the noun begin with a vowel, or an h mute, it must, whether it be of the masculine or of the feminine gender, have the $de\ l$; and in every instance the plural noun takes des for of the. Let us here take the same four nouns that we took in the last paragraphs.

du panier, of the basket.
                                      des paniers,
                                                          of the baskets.
de la table.
                   of the table.
                                      des tables.
                                                          of the tables.
de l'oreiller.
                  of the pillow.
                                      des oreillers.
                                                         of the pillows.
de l'âme,
                  of the soul.
                                      des âmes,
                                                         of the souls.

What was said in the last paragraph about the h mute applies here also; and we therefore say, de l'heure, de l'houneur, du hibou, and de la hache.

80. In like manner the French Article unites itself with the preposition a (to). In speaking of a basket, instead of saying a le panier, we must say au panier; that is to say, to the basket. But if our noun be of the feminine gender, we must use the two words; we must not say au, but a la. Then, as in the case of du, comes the same rule about the h nute; and in the plural number, be the gender as it may, aux is the word that answers to our to the. Therefore the four nouns which we have already had twice before us, will again come before us thus:

au panier, to the basket.
à la table, to the table.
à l'oreiller, to the pillow.
à l'âme, to the soul.

aux paniers, to the baskets.

aux tables, to the tables.

aux oreillers, to the pillows.

aux âmes, to the souls.

Bear in mind what was said at the close of the last paragraph about the h mute and the h sounded, and then you will perceive that we must say à l'heure, à l'honneur, au hibou, à la hache.

81. Now, if you have strict attention to the three last paragraphs; if you read them over in the manner that I have directed, and write them down on paper, you will soon see no difficulty in the matter, though the French Article is applied to the Nouns in so many forms, while ours always retains the same form, and though in some of the instances above given, the French say in one word what we say in two. Let me go, here, a little out of my way, in order to inform you, that you will find the like of this to a great extent by-and-by. We say, to write, to read, and the like; but they say, écrire, lire. We say, you will write; but they say, vous écrirez; making use of two words where we make use of three. The reason of this will appear very clearly to you by-and-by; but the thing itself I have just mentioned here, to guard you against expecting to find the two languages answering each other word for word.

- 82. But we have not yet done with the use of the Article with nouns. As far as relates to common nouns, taken in a definite sense; that is to say, when we are speaking of particular persons or things by names common to all of the kind, the above rules make all clear But there are three other views to take of enough. the use of the Article with nouns; first, when the noun is the name of persons or things of whom or of which there is but one in the universe, or when it is the name of a species or sort: second, when the noun is a proper name; third, when the noun means a part, or parcel, or quantity of any thing. In all these respects the use of the French Article differs greatly from that of the English; and this will be seen in the three following paragraphs, to which I must beg you to pay strict attention.
- 83. When there is but one of the kind in the universe, we, in English, sometimes make use of the Article with the noun, and sometimes not. We say, God, Christ, heaven, hell. The French say Dieu, but they say le Christ, le ciel, l'enfer. They, as well as we, say la mer, the sea; l'air, the air; la terre, the earth; le soleil, the sun; la lune, the moon. This is, however, a matter of such limited extent; there are so few nouns of this. description, that you will very soon learn to avoid errors in applying the article to them. But when nouns are the names of whole species or sorts, the manner of applying the article in French is very different from that of applying it in English. We sometimes, in English, in speaking of animals, make use of the singular number to express a whole kind, and then we use the article; as, the dog is faithful: and the French do the same; as, le chien est fidèle. Just take a look for a moment at paragraph 54, where this matter was before spoken of. In speaking of mankind we do not use the article. We say, for instance, man is the master of other animals. The French say l'homme. They adhere to the use of the article in every such case. We, generally, in speaking of kinds, which consist of individuals, animate or inanimate, make use of the plural number, and, in such cases, use no article; as, baskets are useful owls eatch mice. But the French always put the article; as, des paniers sont utiles, les hibous attrapent les souris. We sometimes, indeed, make use of the article in cases that appear to be like these; but it is when we do not mean the whole of a kind. We say, for instance, the apples are dear, the owls are numerous this year. But here we do not mean to speak of the whole of the kinds, but of the apples and of the owls that come somewhat within our observation and knowledge. The French make no distinctions of this sort; they always put the article.

We, when we have to speak of things, the kinds of which admit not of individuality, such as sugar, water, wine, beer, and the like, do not use the article; as, sugar is sweet. But the French always use it; as, le sucre est doux. We, as in the case of the apples just mentioned, sometimes use the article before these uouns expressing masses; but the French always do it. It is the same with regard to the nouns expressing the feelings and qualities of the mind, the virtues, the vices, and so forth. We say, for instance, friendship, shame, anger; they say, l'amitié, la honte, la colère.

- 84. Next, as to proper names. You have seen, in paragraph 53, what proper names, or nouns are. Just read that paragraph over once more, before you go on farther with this. Now, then, observe, we do not use articles before proper names of human beings, nor before proper names given to animals of any sort. We sometimes make use of a sort of poetic license, and say the Swifts, or the Racines, meaning men of the stamp of those celebrated writers; and in the same sort of way, we say a Swift, or a Racine. The French do the same; but this is a mere license, and has nothing to do with Grammar. But the French use the article with the proper names of countries, and in many other instances, when we do not, as you will find more fully explained when you come to the Syntax of Articles.
- 85. We now come to the noun, when used to express a part, a parcel, a quantity of persons, or things; and here the difference between the two languages is very great. We, generally, in these cases, make use of the word some; as, give me some wines, give me some beer; give me some apples. But the French know nothing at all of the word some, used in this sense. Their word quelque answers to our some, but they do not use it in the manner here spoken of. They use the article, united, as we have above seen it, with the preposition de (of), according to the gender and number of the nonn, thus:

Give me some wine;
Give me some beer,
Give me some apples,
Donnez-moi de la bière.
Donnez-moi des pommes.

That is to say, give me a part or quantity of the wine, and so on. But, observe, when there is an adjective that comes before the noun, the article is left out, and the preposition de (of) only is used; as,

Give me some good wine, Give me some good beer, Give me some good apples. Donnez-moi de bon vin.
Donnez-moi de bonne bière.
Donnez-moi de bonnes ponimes.

The reason is, you see, the adjective changes to agree with the noun in gender and number; and, therefore, the article is not wanted. Here we have, give me of good wine; and so on, and not of the, as in the former eases. But, observe again, if the adjective come after the noun, then the article must be used; as,

Give me some red wine, Give me some strong beer, Give me some ripe apples, Donnez-moi du vin rouge. Donnez-moi de la bière forte. Donnez-moi des pommes mâres.

That is to say, word for word; give me of the wine red; give me of the beer strong; give me of the apples ripe. And, strange as this seems to our cars, a Frenchman would not understand you if you were to say, Donnez-noi quelque rouge vin. Nay, if you were to say, rouge vin, forte bière, and mûres pommes, he would wonder what you meant. Yet this is what you naturally would say, unless you were taught the principles and rules of Graumar.

86. I have now gone through the Etymology of the Noun. I have considered it in its Branches, its Genders, its Numbers, and its Cases; and I have, towards the close of this Letter, given an explanation of the use of the Article, which I could not so well give until I had laid before you an account of the Noun. I shall, in the next Letter, proceed to the Etymology of the Pronoun; but before you enter on that, I beg you to read once more, very attentively, all the foregoing Letters.

LETTER VIL

ETYMOLOGY OF PRONOUNS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- 87. In paragraph 34 I described to you, in general terms, the nature and use of Pronouns. We are now going to treat of the etymology of this sort of words; that is to say, we are going to see how they vary their forms to suit themselves to the various circumstances in which they may be wanted to be used; and this variation of form we shall find much more extensive in the French than in the English Pronouns.
- 88. There are five Classes of pronouns: the Personal; the Possessive; the Relative; the Demonstrative; and the Indeterminate. For you, in this early stage of your study, to be able to distinguish these Classes one from the other, is impossible. You will be able to do this by-and-by; but it is necessary for me to make the division into classes here; because I shall have, almost directly, to speak of Pronouns under these different denominations.
- 89. PERSONAL PRONOUNS are those which take the place of nouns. This office is, indeed, performed by all Pronouns, and hence comes their name. But the other Pronouns do not supply the place of nouns in the same way, and in a manner so complete. There are Three Persons: for instance, "I am writing to you "about him." You see, then, that the pronoun which represents the person that speaks, is in the first person; that which stands in the place of the name of the person who is spoken to, is in the second person; and that which stands in the place of the name of the person spoken of, is in the third person. This circumstance of person is a matter to be strictly attended to; because, as you will by-and-by see, the verbs vary their endings to correspond with the person of the pronoun.

90. Pronouns of the First and Second Person vary their form to express number, and those of the Third Person to express gender also. And here we come to a comparison between the English and French in this respect.

		GULAR.	PLURAL.
1st Person,		je or moi.	we,	nous.
2nd Person,	thou,	tu.	you,	rous.
3rd Person, Masculine,	he,	il.	they,	ils.
- Feminine,	she,	elle.	they,	elles.
- Neuter,	it.		they.

Thus, you see, as was explained in paragraphs 54 and 55, the French have no neuter gender. All, with them, is mule or female; so that they have no word to answer to our it; nor have they any use for such a word. In speaking of a man we say, he is; of a stick, it is; but they have il est in both cases. Besides this, you see that, in the third person plural, we have only our they, whether we speak of males, females, or neuters. But they have a change in their pronoun to agree with the gender of the nouns that the pronouns represent. Whether we speak of males, or of females, or of neuters, we say they are, but the French, in speaking of males, say ils sont, and of females, elles sont.

91. Besides the Number and Gender, there is the Case to be considered in these personal pronouns. In paragraphs from 72 to 77 inclusive, I explained the nature of the cases; and I there apprised you, that when you came to the pronoun, you would find that it had different endings, or, rather, that it assumed different forms, to accord with the different cases; as, I, me, he, him, and so on. The following table will exhibit the difference between the English and the French in this respect; but there will still remain much to be explained:

SINGULAR NUMBER.

	Nominative.	Possessive.	Objective.
1st Person,	he, il.	of me, de moi, of thee, de toi, of him, de lui. of her, d'elle. of it.	me, me, moi. thee, te, toi. him, le, lut. her, la, elle, lui. it.

Before we go to the Plural Number, we must pay a little attention to this table. You have been told about the numbers and genders before; but here you see new changes to designate the cases, and you see that these changes are not nearly so frequent in English as in French. You see, in the objective case, me and moi for our me; you see le and lui for our him: you see la and lui for our her. Now, sometimes the one of these is used, and sometimes the other. When the one ought to be used, and when the other, the Suntax of Pronouns will teach you; but let me just give you an example herc. Donnez-moi le bâton que Jean me donna hier. That is, give me the stick that John gave me yesterday. The Syntax will teach you why it ought to be moi in one place, a: d me in the other. You see le and la in this table answering to our him and her: and this may puzzle you, because you have seen so much of the le and la, as Articles. But I observed to you before, in paragraph 43, that words frequently belonged to two parts of speech; or, rather, that though eontaining the same letters, they were, in different situations, different words. Example: Envoyez ici le messager que je le récompense. That is, send hither the messager that I may reward him. Again: Prenez la junent et mettez-la dans la basse-cour. Take the mare and put her in the yard. Here the word la comes three times: twice it is an article, answering to our the, and once a pronoun, answering to our her. For some time you will think that this is very strange, and that this French is an odd sort of language. The French think just the same of ours till they understand it; and you will find, by-and-by, that it is all precisely as it ought to be, and that it would be odd, indeed, if it were any thing other than that which it is. We now come to the plural number.

PLURAL NUMBER.

		Nominati	ve. Posse	essive.	Objective.
	1st Person,			de nous. 118,
	2nd Person,	you, vous.	of you,	de rous, you
١,	3rd Person, Masculine,				m, les, leur, eux. 🗅
	- Feminine,	they, elles.	of them,	d'elles. the	m, les, leur, elles.
	- Neuter.	they.	of them.	the	m.

Here seems to be a pretty confusion; for here is our they sometimes answered by ils, then by eux, and both in the masculine. Then our them is sometimes less and sometimes leur, in both genders; and then it is eux in one gender, and elles in the other. Here, too, we see the plural article less answering to our them. But all this, puzzling as it is to you at present, will become perfectly plain by-and-by. You will be told, for instance, that when the werb signifies communication from one person or thing to another, it takes leur, and that, when it signifies something done, to an object, it takes les, or eux, or elles, as the case may be. Speaking of cattle, we should say, mettez-les dans la basse-cour, et donnez-leur du foin. Put them in the yard and give them some hay; that is to say, give to them some hay.

- 92. Once more let me remind you, that you must not be at all surprised at what appears to you to be a strange placing of the French words. You must get this surprise out of your mind as soon as possible, and learn to think that it is right that one language should differ thus from another. Remember also what I have said about the same letters not always making the same word. For instance, the leur that you see here means to them; but it means, in other cases, their. In the first instance it is a personal pronoun, in the latter a possessive pronoun. Pay attention to this, or it will cause you to weste your time.
- 93. Before I go to the next class of Pronouns, let me observe, that the second person singular, tu, toi, te, answering to our thou and thee, are not used in French much more than our thou and thee are in English. Something more they are indeed; for the French thou little children, and also very low people. They do it, too, when upon terms of very great familiarity. But, generally speaking, they, like us, use the second person plural, instead of the second person singular; and, as we say you instead of thou, they say vous instead of tu. The same may be observed as to thy and thine, of which you will see more presently.
- 94. POSSESSIVE PRONOUNS. These do not indeed take the place of nouns; but as they come immediately from the personal pronouns, it is better to place them here than any where else. They are unaffected by case, because they have nouns always with them, expressed or understood. They are as follows:

1st Person,.....
2nd Person, Masculine, Feminine,

singular person.

my, mon, ma, mes,
thy, ton, ta, tes.
line,
ine,
hers, son, sa, ses.

PLURAL, PERSON. our, noire, nos. your, voire, vos. their, leur, leurs. their, leur, leurs. their.

Neuter. Here you see a great many changes of the Freuch pronoun; and you see that our one word my, for instance, has three words, by either of which it may be answered. But, observe, our possessive pronouns agree in number and gender (where they meddle with gender) with the noun which is the possessor; whereas the French possessive pronoun pays no attention to the possessor, but agrees in number and gender with the persons or things possessed. Thus, while we say, in English, my father, my mother, my brothers, my sisters; the French say, mon père, ma mère, mes frères, mes sœurs. If we have to speak of a master's maid-servant, and of a mistress's man-servant, we must say his maid and her man. But the French must say, sa servante and son domestique. So that you will remember, the gender, as stated in the above table, applies to the English only. The French possessive pronoun forms itself by a rule wholly different from ours. It agrees in number and gender with the person or thing that is possessed, and not that is the possessor. But you will further observe, that, in the plural number of things possessed, the French possessive pronouns take to notice of gender. I say, mes mains, my hands, and mes bras, my arms, though the first is feminine and the last masculine. Neither, you see, is gender taken any notice of in the plural persons, though the things possessed be in the singular. I must say, mon chien, my dog, ma poule. my hen; but I must say, notre ehien and notre peule. The same remark applies to votra and leur, your and their. [As to mon, ton, and son, when before a noun beginning with a vowel or an h mute, see paragraph 309.]

95. But there are some of these possessive pronouns which stand without the noun. They refer immediately to it indeed; but they do not go directly before it, like the others. Such as mine and yours; as, whose pen is that? It is mine. Thus, the pronoun, though it directly refers to the noun, and denotes possession, does not come directly before it. These, in French, take the article; and, in the above ease, in answer to the question about the pen, I must answer, la mienne; and not call it simply mine. As the pronouns must take the article, the article must agree with them in number and gender, as with the nouns, as before shown in the Etymology of Nouns. These pronouns themselves vary their form to express both number and gender in the three persons singular, and to express number in the three persons plural; as follows:

21.	SINGULAR POSSESSION.		PLURAL PUSSESSION.
Masculine. Feminine.		Feminine.	Masculine. Feminine.
mine,	le mien,	la mienne,	les miens,	les miennes
thine,	le tien,	la tienne,	les tiens,	les tiennes.
his,	le sien,	la sienne,	les siens,	les siennes.
hers,	le sien,	la sienne,	les siens,	les siennes.
ours,	le nôtre,	la nôtre,	les nôtres,	les nôtres.
yours,	le vôtre,	la vôtre,	les vôtres,	les vôtres.
theirs,	le leur,	la leur.	les leurs,	les leurs.

The Article is applied to these exactly as to nouns, and according to the instructions in paragraphs from 78 to 83 inclusive. Thus we say, du mien, de la mienne, des miens, des miennes, au mien, à la mienne, aux miens, and aux miennes; and so on, throughout the whole of these pronouns, precisely as in the case of nouns, as explained in the paragraphs just referred to. Once more let me remind you, that whenever these possessive pronouns express gender, it is the gender of the thing possessed, and not the gender of the possessor.

96. RELATIVE PRONOUNS. The following pronouns are called relative, because they generally relate to the nouns which have gone before in the sentence. Indeed, all pronouns relate to nouns. But it is useful to put them in classes, and, therefore, this appellation is given to these pronouns which follow. The Relatives, in English, are who, which, that, and what in some cases. Who becomes whose and whom: the other three do not change their form. The French Relatives are qui, lequel, quoi; and some others that I shall mention presently. We, in some cases, use who and that indifferently for persons and things. Which we apply only to things. These Relative pronouns of the two languages answer to each other thus:

b	who,	qui.	whom,	que, qui.
	that,	qui, que.	which,	qui, que, lequel.
	whose,	de qui, dont.	what,	quoi, que, quel.
	of whom.	de qui. dont.	11	1

This is not the place to go into a detail of the cases when one of these is to be used, and when the other. That will be done in the Syntax of Pronouns, after I shall have gone through the Etymology of Verbs; for we must speak of these when we are giving instructions for the proper use of the pronouns. It seems, at first sight, that there must be great difficulty here, but you will find that all these difficulties gradually disappear.

97. None of the above pronouns, except quel and lequel, change their form to express number and gender. These two do it thus:

Masculine. Feminine.

quel, quels. quelle, quelles. lequel, lesquels. langelle, lesquelles.

The former does not take the article. It mcrely takes the preposition. But the latter takes the article, and joins it to itself.

de auel. de quels. de quelle, de quelles. it quel, à quelle, à quels. à quelles. duquel, desquels, de laquelle. desquelles. auquel, auxquels. à laquelle, auxquelles.

98. DEMONSTRATIVE PRONOUNS are those which point out persons or things in contradistinction to others. Ours are, this, these, that, those, and sometimes what: as, this is the man whom I wanted to see; those are the books which I wish you to read. The French-have one pronoun of this sort, from which all the rest appear to come; and that is ce, which, according to circumstances, means this or that. It becomes cet before a singular noun masculine, beginning with a vowel or an h mute; cette before all feminine nouns in the singular; and ces before all plural nouns of both genders. Besides this, several other pronouns grow out of this one, and vary their forms according to situation and circumstances. As follows:

	SINGU	LAR.
Masculine.		Feminine.
ce, or cet, celui,	this, or that. he, or that.	cette, celle,	this, or that. she, or that.
celui-ci,	this.	celle-ci,	this.
celui-là,	that.	celle-là.	that.
	PLU
Masculine.		Feminine.
ces,	these, or those.	ces,	these, or those.
ceux,	those.	celles,	those.
ceux-ci,	tnese.	celles-ci,	these.
ceux-là,	those.	celles-là.	those.

There are, also, ceci and cela; ce is sometimes put before qui and que, making this that; as, ce que vous dites; this that you say; or, as we should express it, that which you say. All these pronouns take the preposition de or à before them occasionally; but not the article. Observe, I beg you, the little words, ci and là (the latter with an accent, to distinguish it from the article). These, you see, are added to some of these pronouns. Ci means here, and là means there. So that, taken literally, celui-ci means this here, and celui-là means this there. There is, in fact, precisely this same meaning in ceci and cela; only the two former admit of variation to answer the purposes of number and gender, and the two latter do not.

99. INDETERMINATE PRONOUNS make the last class of words of this Part of Speccif. Amongst the most important of the Indeterminate Pronouns are le, en, y, on, and se. These are words of great use in French; and, properly speaking, we have, in English, nothing that answers to some of them. We sometimes, indeed, say, one is pleased, one hears, one thinks, and the like; but this is not the French on, nor is it congenial to our language. And then, when we say one's-self, it is seldom in the way that the French use their se; besides, the se becomes soi in many cases, and is a most prevalent and efficient word in the Freuch language. Therefore, I must not attempt to give you the English of these words here; but request you to bear them in mind as things to be explained in the Syntax of Pronouns. I shall now give you a list of the Indeterminate Pro nouns; and you will see that, though there are no variations in the form of the English Pronouns of this class, it is otherwise with those of the French. Some you will find without variations of form; but the greater part vary to express gender and number.

[Certain other words might be included in the foregoing list; as, autrui, others, other people; qui que ce soit, whoever, whosoever, anybody. Some are classed, according to the sense in which they are used, either as pronouns or as adjectives.]

100. This is a formidable list; but it will be overcome by industry and patience. Some of these words are not always pronouns; and as to the last five in the table, they have by some been called relative pronouns. They do not appear to me to belong to either of those classes; but seem to come under the appellation given to this class. However, it signifies not much how we class them, so that we learn the use of them; so that we get at their true meaning, and learn how to apply them; on what occasions to use them, and how to place them in sentences. To teach us this must be the business of the Syntax. The words chaque, each, or every, quelque, some, or any, tel. such. or like.

are by some considered as pronouns. The two former are more properly adjectives; and so is the latter, excepting when it is employed, as it may be, in the sense of our somebody or certain person.

LETTER VIII

ETYMOLOGY OF ADJECTIVES.

My DEAR RICHARD,

101. Turn to paragraph 35; for there you will find my description of this part of speech. Having read that paragraph, you will now learn the difference between our Adjectives and those of the French, and this difference you will find to be great indeed. Our adjective, is, in all its different situations, the same in form; that is, composed of the same letters, except where its form is changed to express degrees in the qualities, the properties, or the dimensions, of the nouns to which it is applied: as, a great man, a greater man, the great-This is all that our adjectives change their form to accomplish. Sometimes we mark these degrees of emparison by the help of the words more and most; and we can always do it if we like: as, a great man, a more great man, the most great man, not done, generally, when our adjectives are words of one or two syllables; but it is when they are longer words; as, a deplorable event, a more deplorable event. or a most deplorable event. In this respect, the French language is still more simple than ours; for it almost always marks the degrees of emparison in this way; as, un grand homme (a great man), un plus grand homme, le plus grand homme. There are a few words of very common use with regard to which this rule is not followed; but what I have to say further about the degrees of comparison I must put off, till I have spoken of the genders and numbers of Adjectives.

102. In paragraph 55 I opened this subject; and you will do well to read that paragraph again, together with the two following ones. Indeed, it is necessary to read them, as they belong to what I am now writing. Thus, you see, then, that, while our adjectives have no changes of form, except to express the degrees of comparison, no French adjective can be used with propriety (except by mere accident) unless we know how to change its form to make it agree in gender and number with the noun to which it relates. Here is another, and a very great matter, wholly unknown to our language. Our word white, for instance, is always white, whether applied to paper, to skin, or to one paper or two papers, or one skin or two skins. Not so the French word; that is, papier blanc, peau blanche, papiers blancs, peaux blanches. Now, then, let us see what assistance we can get from rules, to enable us to perform this very important part of the business of speaking and writing French. For, mind, errors in this are essential. It will seem strange to you, but it is a fact, that if you were to say, papier blanche, or peau blanc, a Frenchman would scarcely understand you. Odd as it appears to us, that the Article, the Pronoun, and the Adjective, must all agree in gender with the noun; uccless as this appears to us, it must take place in French, or the words that you would utter would be more broken and ridiculous gibberish than ever a Frenchman muttered when only just beginning to make an attempt to speak English.

103. It being, then, absolutely necessary that we know how to vary the adjectives so as to make them agree in gender and number with their nouns, let me now speak to you of the rules for this purpose, beginning with those which relate to the genders.

104. This is by no means so difficult a matter as the gender of nouns. In the case of the adjectives, we get at something worthy of being called rule; whereas, in that of the nouns, we only tease and torment ourselves, and add greatly to our toil, by endeavours to find out rules to ease us of our labour. The Adjective, in its primitive state, as grand (great), is always applicable to the nonn of the masculine gender and singular What we want to know, therefore, is, how to change its form so as to make it of the feminine gender. Ry looking into the Dictionary for the French word to answer to our word pretty, we find joli. tells us that, as homme is man, we may say joli homme. But it must not be joli before femme, woman; and we want to know what it must be. The large Dictionary will, indeed, tell us; but we cannot always have this in our hands; therefore, we seek for rules; and, in this case, we shall find them convenient and easy.

105. The feminine form is given to the Adjective by making some addition, or change, in the ending of it; as, petit (little), petite; or, as, bas (low), basse. Our rules, therefore, must be founded on the ending of the primitive adjective; and they are as follows:

FIRST RULE. All Adjectives that end with an e mute are of both genders. They do not change their form on account of gender; as, un homme sage, une femme sage; a wise man, a wise woman.

Second Rule. Now, generally speaking, the others only add an e mute to form their feminines; as, impertinent, impertinente. And, observe, this is invariably the case with all adjectives ending with vowels: except favori, favourite, the feminine of which is favorite. Béni, blessed, changes to bénie; except when the term to be used refers to the rites of the church, and then we must employ the passive participle of the verb bénir, to bless: as, pain bénit, consecrated bread; eau bénite, holy-water.

THIRD RULE. Adjectives ending in f, change the f into ve; as, positif, positive.

FOURTH RULE. Adjectives ending in c, change the c into che; as, blanc, blanche. There are four exceptions to this rule, public, Grec, Turc, caduc, which change the c into que; as, public, publique.

FIFTH RULE. Adjectives ending in n, with an o or ie before the n, add ne; as, bon, bonne; but if there be not an o or ie before the n, the adjectives ending in n follow the second rule; that is to say, they add an e mute: as, fin, fine.

Sixth Rule. Adjectives ending in l, with e, o, u, or ei, before it, add le; as, cruel, cruelle. But if the final l be not preceded by one of theso vowels, or by ei, the adjectives ending in l follow the general rule, and simply take an e mute in addition; as, futil, futile. One exception there is, however, in gentil, which makes gentille.

Seventh Rule. Adjectives ending in t, with e or a before it, generally add te; as, net, nette. But this is not without exception, for secret becomes secrète, which is the ease with some others.

EIGHTH RULE. Adjectives ending in eur or eux, change them into euse; as, moqueur (sneering), moqueuse; religieux (religious), religieuse. But of the adjectives ending in eur, the following are exceptions to this rule, and follow the Second Rule; that is to say, add an e.

	Masc.	, Fem.

minor,	mineur,	: mineure.
superior,	supérieur,	supérieure.
inferior,	inférieur,	inférieure.

The following can be brought under no rule. They are few in number; they are words of very common use, and their manner of forming their feminines may be quickly learned.

vert,	verte.
	mou, fou, beau, nouveau, faux, long, doux, roux, frais, benin, malin, jaloux,

It is to be observed, that beau was formerly written bel; and we now say, bel homme, bel esprit; and bel et bon (literally, handsome and good) is a common phrase.

Nouveau was formerly written nouvel; and it is so still, when coming before a noun which begins with a vowel; as, le nouvel an, the new year. The same with the masculine of mou, which may be mol; as, le mol édredon, the soft down. Also with that of fou, which may be fol; as, while you must say, il est fou d'amour, he is love-mad, you must not say, c'est un fou amour, it is a foolish love affair, but, c'est un fol amour.

106. If these rules be properly attended to, there can be few mistakes as to the gender of adjectives, which, you will bear in mind, depends, in all cases, upon the gender of the nouns to which they belong.

107. As to the Number, adjectives form their plurals from their singulars in the same manner that nouns do, and that manner is described fully in paragraph 68, to which you must now go back. Read that whole paragraph again very carefully, and apply to the adjectives what you there find in the five rules relating to the numbers of nouns. The adjective is to agree with its noun in number; as, un grand homme, a great man; deux grands hommes, two great men. Having, then, the number of the noun, you use the singular, or the plural, of the adjective accordingly; and, again I observe, you are to form the plural from the singular according to the five rules in paragraph 68, which apply to adjectives as well as to nouns, and which, therefore, it is wholly unnecessary to repeat here.

108. There are about twenty adjectives ending in al, which, like some nouns, have no plural number, except in a particular instance or two; but a detail of these is unnecessary here; because the manner of using them will be amply taught, by-and-by, in the course of the Exercises. This is one of those matters on which a great deal of time might be employed with great ingenuity, but with very little profit.

. 109. There now remains to be noticed the manner of forming the DEGREES OF COMPARISON, mentioned before in paragraph 101. It was there observed, that the French, instead of changing, so frequently as we do, the endings of the adjectives to denote degrees in the qualities and properties and dimensions of the nouns, make use almost always, as we do sometimes, of plus and le plus, answering to our more and the most. Suppose we be speaking of a pretty garden, the degrees would be formed thus:

pretty, prettier, prettiest.
joli, plus joli, le plus joli.

This is almost the invariable rule in French. But, observe, that the le becomes la if the noun be a feminine; so that, if, with this same adjective, we were speaking of a flower, which is feminine, the words must stand thus:

pretty, prettier, prettiest.
jolie, plus jolie, la plus jolie.

110. There needs nothing further to be said on a matter so plain. But there are a few French adjectives which are irregular in this respect. We have, in our language, a few such; as, good, which does not make gooder and goodest, but better and best. We have, besides, bad, little, much, which are also irregular. The French have only four adjectives of this description; and these answer, in point of meaning, to the first three of ours. They are, bon, good; mauvais, bad; méchant, wicked; and petit, little. Their degrees are formed thus.

mauvais,	pire,	1	le pire. *
bad,	worse.	1	the worst.
méchant.	pire,	1	le pire.
wicked,	wickeder,	(•	wickedest.
petit,	moindre,	[le moindre.
little.	less.	i	the least.

Observe, however, that all these, except the first, frequently form their degrees by the aid of plus and le plus. Plus mauvais, plus méchant, and plus petit, are proper enough; and even plus bon is not absolutely bad French. Still, the above is the usual mode of forming the degrees of these adjectives, which form the only exceptions to the general rule.

111. There are, as you will see by-and-by, some of the Adverbs which have degrees of comparison; but that is a trifling matter; and at any rate, it does not belong to that Part of Speech the Etymology of which has been the subject of this Letter. There is much to attend to in placing the adjective; for it must sometimes come before and sometimes after the noun. this is matter for the Syntax of Adjectives. The great thing belonging to adjectives is, the gender. The number must be attended to also; but we are most apt to commit mistakes in regard to the genders. We Enghish are very apt to look upon these genders of adjectives as being uscless. This is, as you will find, a great error. They not only give to the language a pleasing variety of sound; but, in many cases, they tend to prevent sentences from being equivocal.

LETTER IX.

ETYMOLOGY OF VERBS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- of words Verbs are. You must now read that paragraph again with great attention. Having done that, you will enter on an inquiry into the variations of form to which words of this sort are liable; and you will find, that in French these variations are upwards of thirty in number, while in English they are only jour. The verb to find, for instance, becomes findest, finds, found, finding. This verb can take no other than one of these forms; but the French verb trouver, which answers to our verb to find, does, as you will see by-and-by, assume more than thirty different forms; that is to say, is composed, under so many different circumstances, of different letters.
- 113. Now, the Etymology of verbs teaches us when one of these forms is to be used, and when another; and this, there being so many different forms, must evidently be a matter of great importance. In order to know what form the verb is to be in, that is to say, what letters it is to be composed of, we must first learn something about the different circumstances in which verbs may be placed; because, as I have just observed, the verb changes its form to accommodate itself to those different circumstances. These circumstances are, Person, Time, and Mode. Verbs are distinguished as active, passive, or neuter; but that is another matter, and is to be treated of farther on. At present we have to do with the three circumstances just mentioned; because on them depend all the changes in the form of the verb.

114. As to PERSON, you have, in the last Letter. but one, had the distinction about the persons fully explained to you; but you will do well now to read paragraphs 89 and 90 again. I am to speak of the Modes by-and-by; but I must here anticipate a little. There are four modes: the Infinitive, the Indicative, the Subjunctive, and the Imperative. The distinctions will appear more clearly hereafter; but it is necessary to say here, that the Infinitive Mode exhibits the verb in its primitive and nurestricted sense; as, to find. this mode it is a sort of Noun in point of grammar; as, to find faults in others is very common. called the Infinitive Mode, because when used in this mode, or manner, the verb is in its large and general sense, and not confined to person or time. which induces me to introduce this matter here is, to show you, before we enter into a comparison of the two languages with respect to verbs, the difference between an English and a French verb in this their primitive, or original, form. Our verb in this state has the word to always with it and belonging to it. The French verb has no such thing. It is complete in itself; and, accordingly, trouver means to find. Bearing this in mind, we will now proceed to consider the circumstances of Person. The Verb must agree in person with the nounfor pronoun. For instance, I say, I find; but I must say, thou findest, and he finds. Then, if I am speaking of the act of a number of persons, I must not say, they finds, but they find. However, in our language, the charges in the form of the verb are, as was before observed, few, while in the French they are numerous; and I will now give you a specimen of the great difference of, the two languages in this respect.

je trouve,	I find.	nous trouvous,	we find.
tu trouves,	thou findest.	vous trouvez,	you find.
il trouve.	he finds.	ils trouvent,	they find.

Here, you see, there are only three different forms of the English verb, while there are five of the French; and these differing, toe, very widely from each other.

115. TIME is the next circumstance; for an action, or a state of being, may be spoken of as in the present, the past, or the future time: as, I find, I found, I shall find. The verb changes its form, therefore, to suit itself to this circumstance of time; but, its changes in French are very different from the changes in English. In English we generally add ed to the present time of the verb, in order to make the past time; as, I love, which makes, I loved. I must stop here to remark, that we, as well as the French, have some irregular verbs, and that these do not form their past times in the same way; as, write, which makes wrote; or, with the verb to find, which makes found. But this is a matter to be treated of farther on. At present we must confine ourselves to an explanation of the difference in the manner in which the two languages make the changes in their verbs, in order to denote the circumstance of time; that is to say, in order to tell us, whether the action spoken of be done in the present, was done at a past, or is to be done at a future, time. Let us now see the difference.

je trouvais,	I found.	nous trouvious,	we found.
lu troncais,	thou foundest.	vous trouviez,	you found.
il tr ouvait,	he found.	ils trouvaient,	they found.

TIME. 81

Thus, you see, the difference is great indeed; and you will, of course, see that this circumstance of time is of great importance. But far is this from being all with regard to the past time; for the French have two past That which I have exhibited is called the past imperfect; the other, which you will see a specimen of presently, is called the past perfect. When one of these is to be used, and when the other, will be explained when we come to the Syntax of Verbs, which we shall in Letter XXIII. (Par. 387); but they must be both noticed here; for one of them is as often used as the other, and they must by no means be confounded with each other. In some cases I must translate I found, by jetrouvais; but in other cases I must translate it by je trouvai; and I must go through all the persons in the following manner:

je trouvai, I found. nous trouvânes, we found.
tu trouvas, thou foundest. vous trouvâtes, vou found.
il trouva, he found. ils trouvêrent, they found.

Then, as to the future time, we, in English, have the little words will and shall, which we put before the verb to express the future meaning; but the French have no such little words? mind that, I beg you. They express the future meaning by a change in the ending of the verb itself; and this constitutes one of the great differences in the two languages. Our words will and shall not only express future time, but convey also a meaning as to intention and obligation. The French have no different endings of their verbs to express these, which, in their language, are to be gathered from the tenor of the whole sentence. They have complete verbs which express will, power, and duty, and that supply the place of our will, can, shall, should, might, and the rest. Letter XXIV. (Par. 444) will contain an account of these. In exhibiting the difference between the languages in this respect, I shall take the word will, though you will understand, that I might, for this purpose, take shall with equal propriety.

je trouverai, I will find. nous trouverons, we will find. tu trouveras, thou wilt find. vous trouverez, you will find. ils trouveront, they will find.

Great as these changes in the form of the verb are, there are other and still greater changes; but you have now seen a sufficient specimen of those which arise out of the circumstances of person and of time.

116. MODE generally means manner; and in grammar it has the same meaning. At the beginning of paragraph 114 I have spoken of the Infinitive Mode. I have now to speak of the three other Modes: the Indicative, the Subjunctive, and the Imperative, the two former of which must be earefully distinguished from each other; because the verb, in its several times, changes its form to suit itself to this eircumstance of The Imperative Mode you will find to be a Mode. matter of little difficulty; but when you ought to use the Indicative, and when the Subjunctive, form, you will find to be a matter of great importance. You will, therefore, give your best attention to what I am now about to say. We sometimes speak of an action in a declaratory manner; that is to say, we INDICATE, or declare, or in other words, merely say, that the action is taking place, or that it has taken, or will take, place. But at other times we speak of it in a conditional In these latter cases there is always something subjoined, in the way of condition or consequence. There is some subjoined, or SUBJUNCTIVE, circumstance.

When, therefore, a verb is used in the first of these manners, it is in the Indicative Mode; and when in the second, it is in the Subjunctive Mode. These names and distinctions would be useless, if it were not that the form of the verb changes in order to agree with the Modes. For instance, I say, he finds. This simply indicates that he does the act. But I must say, he find, if I have a condition or consequence to subjoiu; as, though he find a sheep, he cannot sell it. Thus you see in the one case it is finds, and in the other case find, though the person and the number of the pronoun be the same in both cases. In our lauguage, however, there is but little variation in the verb itself to express this change in the Modes. We express tile greater part of the changes by the means of the little words "naty, might, could, would, or should. The French have no such words; and, in all these cases of a subjunctive nature, they express themselves in a manner wholly different from ours, as you will see by-and-by, when you come to the Syntax of Verbs. The Verb in the Indicative Mode is as it has been exhibited in the two preceding paragraphs, showing the present, past, and future of the verb to find. In the Subjunctive there is no future, properly so called; but, a present time and two past times. The present of the Subjunctive is, in the three persons singular, and in the third person plural, the same precisely as the present of the Indicative, in the verb trouver. But this is not the ease with some other verbs, as you will see by-and-by. The present of the Subjunctive is, therefore, as follows:

je treure,	I may find.		nous trouvions,		we may find.
tu troures,	thou mayest find.	!	rous trouviez,	i	you may find.
il trouve,	he may find.	ı	ils trouvent,	,	they may find.

Before every phrase of this sort, in this mode of the verb, there is, in French, que, answering to our that; and in most cases there is the that in English, either expressed or understood; but I omit the que here; because I am here merely showing you how the verb changes its form. The next change, or rather, set of changes, that it takes, is to express the past time of the Subjunctive. I shall take the word should to put before the English verb; but would, or could, might do as well for this mere purpose of exhibiting the changes in the form of the French verb.

je trouverais, I should find.

tu trouverais, thou shouldest find.

il trouverait, he snould find.

nous trouveries, you should find.

ils trouveraient, they should find.

Now, this is not, strictly speaking, a past time either in French or in English; nor is that which I am now going to exhibit. But it is necessary to give them names; and, therefore, the above is called the past imperfect of the Subjunctive Mode, and the following is called the past perfect of the Subjunctive Mode; and this is in imitation of the names rather than of the things used in the Indicative Mode. This past perfect, then, is as follows:

je trouvasse, I might find.

tutronvasses, thou mightest find.

il trouvât, he might find.

il trouvasses, 'you might find.

il trouvasses, 'they might find.

But you must take care to remember, that it is not always that these English phrases are translated by these French phrases. It frequently happens, that where the Indicative Mode is used in one language the Subjunctive is used in the other. These matters will be explained when we come to the Syntax. What I am doing here is merely teaching you the changes in the form of the verbs. Of the Modes, then, there remains only the Imperative. It is called the Imperative, because it is used in commanding; but it is also used in calling to or invoking. It is, in fact, in English, nothing more than the present of the Indicative, accompanied with some words expressing a command, a wish, or a prayer, or the like. In the verb trouver it causes no change at all in the form of the verb, except in the second person singular; but this is not the case with regard to some other verbs. The first person singular has no place here; because no person commands or calls to himself.

trouve, find. trouves, let us find. find. qu'il trouves, let them find. qu'ils trouvest, let them find.

When we are speaking directly to another, or to others, in the second person, either singular or plural, we have only to name the act that they are to do at our request or command; and, therefore, if we want them to find, we simply say, find. But, when there are others to partake with us in the act, or where the parties who are to act are third parties, we make use of let. The French, you see, in the first of these cases, simply use the word describing the act; as, trouvons, which means find we, or let us find. And in the third person, whether singular or plural, they make use of que; that is to say, that. Literally, that he find, that they find. The qu'il and qu'ils are written with the elision, according to the rule which you found in paragraph 24. It must not be que il, because il begins with a vowel. This is, then, that he find. And, if you examine closely, you will find our own phrase to be precisely the same. For, what do we mean by let him find? We may, in some cases mean, indeed, to give him leave to do it; but, in general, this is not what we mean. Our meaning, when we make use of such phrases, generally is, let things be so that he find, or perform the act of finding. The French simply say, that he find.

117. I have now gone through the circumstances of Person, Time, and Mode. But the verb assumes two other forms, called the Participles. We have the same in English; as, finding, found. They are called participles, because they partake of the nature of adjectives and of verbs. Of verbs they are a part; and yet they are frequently adjectives: as, I am killing a sheep; it is a killing disease. In the first of these instances killing is a verb, in the last an adjective. This is called the active participle. Killed, which is, with us, spelled like the past time of the verb, is called the passive participle. I killed a sheep; there is a killed sheep. In the first of these instances it is a verb, in the last an adjective. You will see that the French passive participle is not the same in form as the past time of the verb. (See further, as to participles, paragraph 122, and paragraph 436.)

118. Let me now lay before you a complete Conjugation of the two verbs before mentioned, to find, and trouver. To conjugate means, in its usual acceptation, to join together; and, as used by grammarians, it means to bring together, and to place under one view, all the variations in the form of a verb, beginning with the Infinitive Mode, and ending with the Participle. These two verbs, then, I will now place before you, in all their persons, times, and modes. But before I give you the conjugation of a verb, let me observe that there are two ways of writing the past imperject times of the French verbs. You see, in the conjugation opposite, trouvais, trouvait, trouvaient; and again, trouverais, trouverait, trouveraient. Voltaire wrote trouvais instead of trouvois, and so on in the other parts of the verb, where o used formerly to be employed before i, as you will see in old French books. Since the time of Voltaire the a, instead of the o, has been almost universally adopted. Observe, that there ought to be que before the pronouns, in the present and past perfect times especially, of the subjunctive mode; as, que je trouve, que je trouvasse, and so on; but I leave out the que for want of room in the width of the page.

119. Thus have you this French verb completely before you. You will observe that I have, all through, taken no notice of genders; but you will conclude, of course, that as, whether it be he, she, or it, the verb is the same in English, so it is in French, whether it be il or elle. I have therefore thought it unnecessary to put the she, or the it, or the elle, in any of these tables. You will also observe, that the French phrases in the Subjunctive would, in part at least, require the que before them; but the object here has been to bring you acquainted merely with the changes in the form of the French verb. According to the rules of grammar every complete sentence begins with a CAPITAL LETTER; I have not observed this rule in the Exemples, Tables, and Conjugations; because it would cusumber the page, and, in some cases, not leave room for placing the words in a neat and clear manner.

120. This table of conjugation should be well considered by you before you go any further. You will, at first, think that all these endings of the French verb, or rather, all these various forms, make a difficulty never to be overcome. But a little time will, if you be attentive and industrious, make all this difficulty disappear. You will remark that the end of the verb consists of er; and that all the changes consist of letters put in the place of, or added to, the er. Now, it is the same in other verbs. For instance, gronder (to scold) becomes je groude, je groudais, je grondai, je gronderai, je gronde, je gronderais, je grondasse. So that, when you become perfectly well acquainted with the changes in the verb troucer, you will of yourself be able to make 'all the changes in other verbs; and you will be surprised how readily you will do this in a very short time.

Parler (to speak) will no sooner meet your eye than you will know that you must say, je parle, je parlais, je parlerai, je parlerais, and so on.

121. This, however, would be too easy. Every person would learn French, if the difficulties were no greater than this. All the French verbs do not end in er; and those that do not are not conjugated in this way; that is to say, they do not vary their forms in the way that the verb trouver varies its form. But observe, the whole number of French verbs do not exceed three thousand, or thereabouts; and of these, about two thousand seven hundred end in er: so that the rest are not very numerous. This rest, however, are, for the far greater part, reducible to rule. They are formed into nine other classes, which are called Conjugations, and which, together with the verbs ending in er, make ten conjugations in the whole. There is one class which end in ir, and this class contains about a hundred and ninety-eight verbs, all conjugated in the same way. So that, if we were to make but two regular Conjugations, there would remain but about a hounted verbs not included in these two. These hundred would, of course, have no rule, and would be to be learned separately. If we make ten Conjugations, we reduce the irregular ones to about forty; and I shall make ten Conjugations, because the verbs are so considered in Boyer's Dictionary, which is the dictionary in general use. You will perceive, however, that this is merely arbitrary; we make tiro or ten, just as we please. It is a mere classification of the verbs, for the sake of more easily learning how to make the changes in their form.

122. Then, after we have made the ten classes, or Conjugations, there remain about forty verbs, which do not come into either of those classes, and these are called Irregular Verbs. In English we call those of our verbs regular, which end their past time and their passive participle in ed; as in the case of to love, which becomes loved. Those which do not end their past time and their passive participle thus, we call irregular. For instance, to write, is irregular, because I cannot say writed, but must say wrote and written. So with to find, which must be found, and not finded. We have, in English, about a hundred and forty of these irregular verbs; but then we have but one Conjugation of regular verbs, while in French we can make ten. Yet this will be found to be a matter by no means full of difficulty. When we have gone through the principles and rules of Etymology, you will find, in Letter XIV., all these irregular verbs brought together under one head, or into one TASK, and also an account of the ten Conjugatious, and a method pointed out for learning the whole. I avoid introducing this detail here, because it would too much interrupt your progress, and carry your mind too far away from what it has already been engaged in. My business here has been to show you the principles upon which the French verbs vary their forms; and for this purpose one verb is better than many. I, therefore, leave all the details relating to the several Conjugations, and to the Irregular Verbs, to be treated of in another place, where you will find them in due time.

123. But there are two verbs, into all the particulars relating to which I must go here; because there is no other verb that can be used in all its expacities without one of these two being used with it. These two are Avoir (to have) and Effec (to be). These, in French, as well as in English, are called Auxiliary Verbs. The word auxiliary means helping, or helper; as an auxiliary army is an army that comes to the help or assistance of another army. These verbs are so called because they help other verbs to express that which they otherwise would not express. Suppose the subject we are talking about to be my finding a sheep, or anything else, and that I want to tell you that the act is ended, that I have closed the work; I cannot easily, if at all, tell you this without the help of the verb to have. say I find, or found, or will find, a sheep, neither of these will answer my purpose. No; I must call in the help of the verb to have, and say, I have found a sheep. So, in the past time, it would be, I had found a sheep. It is precisely the same in French.

j'ai trouvé un mouton,
j'avais trouvé un mouton,
I had found a sheep.
I had found a sheep.

Now, observe, the verb to have, besides being a helper, is sometimes a verb of itself, a principal in the sentence, and signifies possession; as, I have a sheep; that is to say, I possess a sheep. It is, as a principal, a verb of great use in both languages; and in French, I think, more than in English. The French say, sometimes, son avoir, meaning a person's possessions: that is to say, his or her to have. Odd as this sounds to us, we ourselves say, a man's havings, though the word is rather out of use. Instead of saying, his havings are great, the French say, his to have is great. This you will by-and-by find to be a turn of the French idion. such cases we mostly make use of the active participle, and they of the infinitive of the verb; as, killing a man is a great crime. They say, not tuant, but tuer un homme est un grand crime. One of our weights is called Avoirdupois. This is all French, avoir (to have) du (of the) poids (weight); that is to say (because we leave out the clu), to have weight; or, in other words, to have enough of it; and this is, accordingly, our heaviest weight. I was considering avoir as an auxiliary; but this digression appeared necessary, in order to show you the principle out of which has arisen the use of this verb along with other verbs. The idea of possession always adheres to the verb avoir: for, when I say, I have found a sheep, I, in fact, say that the act is mine: I am the owner of the act; I have it.

124. The verb être (to be) expresses existence, and always carries that idea along with it. To be ill, to be rich, mean to exist in illness, or in riches. This verb must have the help of to have in its compound times, of which I shall speak presently; but, in French, it is, along with verbs used in a certain way, employed as an auxiliary instead of to have, which is never the case in English; but of this I shall have to speak fully in a few minutes.

125. Let me now lay before you these two verbs, completely conjugated, in the same manner that you have seen Trouver in paragraph 118. But, let me first observe, that you must look again attentively at what I have, in paragraph 118, said about the que, which ought to be placed before the pronouns in the conjugation of the present and of the past perfect of the subjunctive mode; as, jaie ought to be que jaie. I have, as I said before, omitted the que for want of room in the page. Once more, before I give you the conjugation of avoir, let me press upon you the necessity of becoming, as soon as possible, perfectly well acquainted with this verb. You will remember that the compound times of other verbs are formed with its help; and that even the compound of être cannot be formed without the help of avoir. It is, therefore, a word of very great importance, and it merits your best attention. down, in all its forms, very often: and, if you have a teacher, or any one to hear you read, read it over many, many times, --- What was said in paragraph 119, about the she and it in English, and about the elle or elles in French, and also about using the que in the Subjunctive Mode, applies in the case of these auxiliary verbs as well as in that of all others. Read, therefore, that paragraph again, before you go any further. Having well considered all about the verb avoir; having marked well all its changes of form, you will next come to the verb être. But just observe that, there are two ways of spelling aie and aies. Some write aye, ayes, instead of the former. It is of little consequence which spelling we make use of. The same you will see taking place in ETRE; some write, in a part of the verb, soient, and others soyent. I mention it, lest it should be a stumbling-block to you; but it is, otherwise, a matter of no consequence. The verb Avoir ought to be, in all its parts, at your fingers' ends, before you proceed further. You ought to write it many times over; and, if you have a teacher, or any one to read to, it will be good to read it, with its pronouns, fifty times over. The best way is to become very familiar with it before you go to ETRE, so that they may not get confounded in your mind. You have been told that the compound times of verbs are formed by the help of AVOIR? but you will, by-and-by, find that some verbs take ETRE to help in the forming of their compound times. The French say, je svis tombé, I am fallen; and not j'ais tombé, I have fallen. You will soon see something about reflected verbs; and then you will see how frequent and how great the use of this verb être, and how necessary it is that you should have a perfect knowledge of it us soon as possible.

[Note.—Avoir and Etre, whether as auxiliaries or otherwise, are of such constant use, that it must be good for the learner to see the whole of the changes of each in one view. Each, therefore, of these verbs will here be given in the compound as well as in the simple form, the two forms standing opposite to one another, the simple form on the left-hand, and the compound on the right-hand page.]

- 126. Here, then, you have these two important verbs in all their various forms. Great, indeed, is the change from être to fussions; but it is still the same word. Our to be, becomes was and were: but yet these are still the same word, only under different forms; and as we know very well when to use one of these forms, and when the other, so you will, in a short time, with due diligence, know when you are to use one of the French forms and when the other.
- 127. I have now to call your attention to the Compound Times of verbs, and to verbs when they are called Reflected; because it is here that you will see the use of Avoir and être as auxiliaries. The compound times are so called because they are expressed by two verbs instead of one; as, I have found; I had found; and so on. But, in fact, there is nothing more in this, than that the verb to have is put before the passive participle of the principal verb; so that these compound times, as they are called, are nothing more than the simple times of the verb to have, going before the passive participle of some other verb; thus:

j'ai trouvé un mouton,
j'avais trouvé un mouton,
j'eus trouvé un mouton, j'aurai trouvé un mouton,
j'aie trouré un mouton,
j'aie trouré un mouton,
j'eusse trouvé un mouton,
j'eusse trouvé un mouton,

have found a sheep,
had found a sheep,
had found a sheep,
shall have found a sheep,
may have found a sheep,
I should have found a sheep,
I might have found a sheep,

You see, it is always trouve; that is to say, the passive participle of the verb trouver. The change is only in the auxiliary; and this is all that need be said about the compound times, except that we have now to notice how the Reflected verbs are used, and how the auxiliaries are employed in relation to them.

128. A Reflected Verb is one which expresses an action that is confined to the actor; and, in this respect, the two languages differ materially. But before I say more of this matter, I must speak of verbs as active and neuter. A verb is called active when it expresses an action of one person or thing which passes to another person or thing; as, the hawk kills the sparrow. A verb is called neuter, either when there is no action; as, the hawk moults (or lets fall out its feathers), or when there is an action which does not pass to any object; as, the hawk flutters. It is the same in French; that is to say, the first of these verbs is active in French, and the two last neuter, in one language as well as in the other; and the translation into French would stand thus:

le faucon tue le moineau, le faucon mue, le faucon volète, the hawk kills the sparrow, the hawk moults, the hawk flutters.

Thus, you see, in the first instance, there is an action, and it passes from the hawk to the sparrow. In the second, there is no action on the part of the hawk; for his feathers merely come out without his doing anything. In the third, there is an action, and of the hawk himself too; but it does not pass to anything else. This distinction, therefore, between active and nenter verbs is very clear; and it is of some importance, because the use of other words in the sentence must depend, sometimes, on whether the yerb be active or neuter. But, mind, there is no change in the form of the verb to express the active, or the neutral character of it.

129. Thus far there is, as to this matter, no difference in the two languages; but many of the verbs, which are merely neuter in English, are reflected in French; and, if reflected, they must be used with a double pronoun, or with a nonn and a pronoun; whereas, if not reflected, they are used in the usual way. Thus, the hawk perches on the tree. Here we, in · English, have the verb used in the common way, just as, the hawk kills, the hawk moults, the hawk flutters. But, this to perch, being a reflected verb, must have, in the French, the pronoun as well as the noun: thus: le faucon se perche sur l'arbre; or, if the pronoun be used instead of hawk, it must be il se perelie sur l'arbre; that is to say, word for word, he himself perches upon the tree. We may, in English, say, he perche's himself upon the tree, but this we do not frequently do. There are some few cases in English where it is necessary for us to use the self; as, I hurt myself; but, in French, there are great numbers of verbs that must be thus used; and, in the Dictionary, you will find them with se always before them; thus, Se Percher, To Perch. Any active verb may be, and, indeed, must be, used in the same way as a reflected verb, if the action be done to the actor. Thus, to kill may be used in this manner; as, the hawk kills himself: le faucon se tue. When we use the muself. thyself, himself, and so on, the French verb is sure to be reflected; but it is reflected, in many cases, where we do not use the self.

120. Having explained the reasons upon which this distinction is founded, let us now see how a reflected verb is conjugated; how it is used with the double pronoun; and let us, for this purpose, take the verb to perch.

INFINITIVE MODE.

Se Percher, To Perch. INDICATIVE MODE.

Present Time.

je me perche, tu te perches, til se perche, le perches. I perch. nous nous perchons, vous vous perchez, ils se perchent, we perch. vous perchez, ils se perchent, they perch.

We need not carry the conjugation any further; because the verb goes on changing its form, just like trouver in paragraph 118; and the only difference is, that here there are two pronouns, while in the case of the active verb trouver, there was only one. But, if trouver, or any other active verb, express an action done to, or confined to, the actor, then it must be treated as a reflected verb. So that, if I am talking of persons finding themselves, I must say, je me trouve, tu te trouves, il se trouve, hous nous trouvons, vous vous trouvez, ils se trouvent;

and so on throughout the whole of the verb. In paragraph 99 you have seen Se placed amongst the Indeterminate Pronouns. It is indeterminate because it points out neither gender nor number. It means self or selves: and it is applicable to the third person of both numbers and both genders; for whether we be speaking of males or females, of one or more, the se never changes its form; thus, il se perche, he perches; elle se perche, she perches; ils se perchent, they perch; elles se perchent, they perch. The above phrases, word for word, would stand in English thus:

je me troure, tu te troures, il se trouve, nous nous trouvens, vous vous trourez, ils se trouvent, I me find, thou thee find, he himself h als, we us find, you you find, they themselves find, This sounds strange to us English, but not stranger than our mode of expression does to the French. I find myself, is just as strange to them. You will ask, perhaps, how it is that nous nous is translated by we us. It is because nous sometimes means we, and sometimes us. And, if you think that it will be difficult to know when it means the one and when the other, pray observe that we are situated in the same manner with regard to our you. You will know when it has the one meaning, and when the other, by its connection with the other words of the sentence.

131. Let me add here, that when there is a Noun used with these reflected verbs, all the difference is, that the first pronoun is left out; as, le faucon se perche, les faucons se perchent, the hawk perches. the hawks perch.

132. Very well, then: all this is, I think, plain enough. But there is another material thing belonging to the reflected verb; namely, the compound times. spoke of these times in paragraph 127, and showed you that they were nothing more than the several parts of the verb Avoir (to have) used with the passive participle of another verb. Read that paragraph again. But, now mind, when it is a reflected verb that you are using, or any verb in the reflected form; when either of these is the case, it is not the verb avoir, but the verb être (to be), that you are to use as the auxiliary, strange as this rule may at first sound to your ears. In paragraph 127 I have given you a table, in the way of specimen, of the conjugation of the verb trouver with avoir. is, in that paragraph, an active verb. I will now take it as a reflected verb also, and show you how it is conjugated with être as well as with avoir.

j'ai trouré un mouton, je me suis trouvé un mouton, je m'étajs tr un'é, j'eus trouvé un mouton, je me fus trouvé un mouton, je me serai trouvé, j'air trouvé un mouton, je me serai trouvé, j'air trouvé un mouton, je me seis trouvé un mouton, je me serais trouvé, j'euses trouvé un mouton, je me serais trouvé, j'euses trouvé un mouton, je me fusse trouvé,

I have found a sheep.
I have found myself.
I had found a sheep.
I had found myself.
I had found myself.
I had found inyself.
I shall have found a sheep.
I shall have found myself.
I may have found myself.
I should have found myself.
I should have found myself.
I should have found myself.
I might have found a sheep.
I might have found a sheep.
I might have found myself.

Thus, you see, all through, it is the verb être, instead of the verb avoir, with which the verb trouver is used in the reflected sense. I have taken here only the first person singular, which is all that is necessary, because the other persons go on in the same way; as, nous avons trouvé un mouton; nous nous sommes trouvés; and so on. But in the Imperative Mode there is a further change; thus:

trouve un mouton, trouve-toi,
qu'il trouve un mouton,
qu'il se trouve.
trouvons un mouton, trouvons-nous,
trouvez un mouton, trouvez-vous,
qu'ils trouvent un mouton,
qu'ils se trouvent, find a sheep, find thyself, let him find a sheep, let us find a sheep, let us find a sheep, let us find ourselves, find a sheep, find yourself, or selves, let them find a sheep, let them find a sheep.

The infinitive is S'être trouvé: the active participle, S'étant trouvé.

I will give you some of the above phrases word for word, as nearly as possible; and, strange as they appear at first, you will, at last, find them natural enough. As far as the verb avoir goes, we think all natural; but, when we come to the verb être, we think all out of place.

je me suis trouvé, je m'étais trouvé, je me serais trouvé, trouve-toi, qu'il se trouve, trouvens-nous, trouvez-vous. I me am found.
I me was found.
I me should be found, find thou thee, that he himself find, find we us, find you you.

This appears monstrous; but, consider it well, and you will find that the me in the French means, in this case, myself as the doer of the deed; and that the fair and full meaning in English, is, I, of myself, or by my owu act, am found, was found, shall be found, and so on. Then, as troitie, in the imperative, means find thou, trouve-toi is find thou thee, which is no more than find thyself. And, if we find it a fault in the French language that it requires find we us, instead of, let us find ourselves, the French will tell us that the fault is in our mode of expression, and not in theirs. Je me suis trouvé is, in good English, I have found myself. Word for word, this would be, in French, j'ai trouré moimême; but this would be bad French; or rather, it would be no French at all, any more than I me am found is English.

133. I have before observed, that the Reflected Verbs are denoted, in the Dictionary, by Se being put before them. I have also observed, that any active verb, expressing an action done to the actor, or confined to the actor, may, as in the case of trouver, become a reflected verb. But, besides these, there are several neuter verbs, which must be conjugated with être, and not with avoir; though this is not the case with neuter verbs in general. Let us take our hawk again in the way of illustration. Tuer, to kill, is an active verb, as we will here use it. Se percher (to perch) is a reflected verb. But jucher (to roost) is a neuter verb. Now, then, speaking of a hawk, we say, il a tué un moineau, il s'est perché sur l'arbre, il a juehé sur l'arbre, he has killed a sparrow. he has perelied on the tree. he has roosted on the tree.

The distinction here, though very nice, is very clear, and must, if you attend to it, explain the whole matter of reflected verbs. To perch on a tree includes an act which the hawk does with regard to himself; but the roosting is totally void of all action. It is an inactive, a neutral state of being; and, therefore, the verb which describes that state is called a neuter verb, and is, in its compound times, conjugated with avoir, and not with être.

134. There are, however, some few neuter verbs, which are conjugated with être and not with avoir; but, you will find a list of these when you come to the Syntax on the Times of Verbs. Sortir (to go out) is, for instance, one of these neuter verbs; as, je suis sorti, I have (that is, literally, am) gone out; and not jai sorti, I have gone out. However, I put off, for the present, this list, and the details on the subject, in order to avoid, as much as possible, giving interruption to this series of principles and rules, which ought to have a constant connection in your mind as you proceed.

135. There is one thing more belonging to reflected verbs; and that is, they have sometimes entre used with them. Entre means, literally, between or amongst; as, entre nous (between ourselves), when there are two of us only. Where there are more, we say, in English, amongst ourselves; but the French say, entre nous, whether there be two or more than two. This entre is a preposition which generally means between or amongst: entre deux, between two; entre trois, amongst three. Now, this preposition is used frequently with reflected verbs; and, to make, in some sort, a part of the verbs themselves; as, S'entre tuer, to kill one another. This is when there are two parties acting, and acting with reciprocity, on each other. [In which case the verb so used is by some grammarians called a reciprocal verb.] In speaking of two men, we say, ils s'entre tuent, they kill one another. When entre is thus used, it makes no difference at all in the manner of conjugating the verb. The entre is prefixed to the verb, and that is all; as:

nous nous entre-tuous, nous nous entre-tuions, ils s'entre-tuent, ils s'entre-tuaient. we kill one another, we killed one another, they kill one another, they killed one another,

Then in the compound times, where we make use of to have, they make use of to be; as:

nous nous sommes entre-tues, nous nous étions entre tues, its se sont entre-tues. its s'étnient entre-tues, we have killed one another, we had killed one another. they have killed one another, they had killed one another,

And in this way goes on the conjugation of any and every verb with entre. [As with sentre donner, to give to each other; sentraider, to help one another; sentraimer, to love one another; sentre ruiner, to ruin one another.] Sometimes the same thing is expressed in another way; as, its se twent l'un l'antre. This also means, they kill one another; and it would seem to be tautology; for it says, its se tuent, which is, they kill themselves; and then comes l'un l'autre, which means, one another; so that they kill themselves and one another also, which would seem to be a little more than is possible. However, this sort of phrase is in common use, and that is enough for us. Though it may be bad philosophy, it is perfectly good French; and that is what we have to look after.

136. There remains now, with regard to the Etymology of Verbs, nothing to be done but to notice a particular manner of using certain verbs only in the third person singular. When used in this manner, they are called, by some grammarians, Impersonal verbs; because they are here used only in the third person singular. Avoir, Etre, and some other words, are used in this way; and, for want of one more appropriate, we may as well use the appellation impersonal: for an appellation of some sort they must have.

137. Avoir is the principal one of these impersonals; and, in this its capacity, it is always used with il y; which, thus used, mean, in English, it there. Let us, then, see how this impersonal is used. Il y a un faucon sur l'arbre. You know that a means has. So that, word for word, this phrase is, it there has a hawk on the tree; though we say, there is a hawk on the tree. If you ask, what business the il (it) has there, the French might ask you what business the it has in our it rains, it snows, it freezes. And, if you think it a sort of nonscuse to say, il y a un fancon sur l'arbre, I assure you that the French would think you downright mad if you were to say y est un faucon sur l'arbre. The verb avoir, when used in this way, ought, indeed, to be called y avoir; for that little word really makes a part of it, and with it the verb is conjugated, precisely as in paragraph 125; only it is confined to the third person singular; as:

il y a un faucon,
il y avait un faucon,
il y eut un faucon,
il y aura un faucon,
il y ait un faucon,
il y aurait un faucon,
il y eut un faucon,
il y eut un faucon,
il y avant un faucon,

there is a hawk.
there was a hawk.
there was a haw k.
there shall be a hawk.
there may be a hawk.
there might be a hawk.
there being a hawk.

It goes through the compound times also; as, il y a ea un faucon, there has been a hawk; and so on.—[It should be observed, that although the "third person singular" only is here mentioned, the anthor afterwards, in paragraph 352, explains how the impersonal is used in reference to persons and things in the plural also.]

138: Ètre is called impersonal, when it is used thus: il est rare de voir un faucon dans la ville; it is rare to see a hawk in the town. This is according to our own manner; and, therefore, we need not bestow any more time upon it here. Sometimes the pronoun ce is used, in such cases, instead of il; as, c'est rare: but we need say no more of that at present; because, when we come to the Syntax of Impersonals, which we shall in Letter XXI., we shall have a great deal to say about il est, c'est.

139. But, there is the Impersonal Falloir (to be necessary), which is a verb of very great importance. It, in most cases, performs the office of our word must; but it does more than that in some cases. The uses of this word constitute one of the great characteristics of the French idiom, viewed in comparison with our idiom. The infinitive Falloir (to be necessary) is out of use. It is never used. The active participle is also out of use; but it has its passive participle in use. With these exceptions it is a verb that goes through all the Modes and Times in the third person singular;

il faut, it is necessary. il fallait. it was necessary. il fallut. it was necessary. il faudra. it will be necessary. il faille. it may be necessary. il faudrait. it should be necessary. il fallût. it might be necessary. il a fallu, it has been necessary.

This is the word-for-word translation. We might use requisite, needful, or any other word or words expressive of what ought to take place. Our should frequently answers the purpose. But must is our great word in these cases; and here the turn of the two languages is wholly different. This difference requires the greatest attention: but this will be fully explained in the Syntax, my business here being to show how the French verbs change their forms, and to explain to you the reasons for those changes. Let me, however, just give you an example or two with must, and let us adhere to our verb trouver:

il faut que je le trouve aujourd'hui, il must find him to-day.
il fallait que je le trouvesse hier, il faudra que je le trouve demain, il must find him to-morrow.

These three French phrases, literally translated, are as follows:

il faut que je le trouve aujourd'hui, it is necessary that I may find him to-day. il fallait que je le trouvasse hier, it was necessary that I might find him yesterday. il faudra que je le trouve demain, it is necessary that I may find him to-morrow.

So that, you see, there is no single word in French that answers to our must. The same meaning is expressed, but it is expressed in another manner. You will observe, that this verb, il faut, forms its compound times like another verb; as, il a fallu; it has been necessarv.

140. There are several other verbs which, for the · reason before-mentioned, are usually called impersonal; such as pleuvoir (to rain), ge'er (to freeze), tonner (to thunder). But there is no difficulty belonging to these; for the French say, il gèle, il tonne, just as we say, it freezes, it thunders. As to rain, indeed, they generally say, il tombe de la plicie, it falls of the rain, or, in good English, rain is falling. But these are matters that properly belong to the Syntax. Il fait, which means, it makes, is one of the impersonals; but it is also part of the verb' faire (to make), and will be found fully conjugated in its proper place. As impersonal, however, it goes through all the Modes and Times; and it is in such common use, and this use is so strongly characteristic of the difference between the two languages, that I must give you an example here. Speaking of the weather, the French say:

> il fait beau, il fesuit beau, il fit beau, il fera beau, it makes fine.

it made fine.
it made fine.
it will make five.

We, in English, do not say, makes, made, and will make; we say is, was, will be. But we are not to find fault with the French on this account. If examined closely, their mode of expression is just as reasonable as—ars. At any rate, they do and will say, il faut beau; and it is for us to learn to say it too.

141. Thus I put an end to my Letter on the Etymology of Verbs. It is full of matter requiring great attention. You will have observed, that its principal object is, to teach you how to make the several changes in the forms of the verbs, according to the several eirenmstances of person, number, time and mode. You will, by-and-by, when I have gone through the Etymology of the Adverbs, Propositions, and Conjunctions, find the Coningations of the Verbs at full length, and with all the details. But before you proceed even to the Etymology of Adverbs, I wish you to become very perfect in your knowledge of the contents of this letter. Write the verb Trouver down, in all its Modes, Times, Numbers, and Persons, till it becomes as familiar to you as your fingers arc. Do the same with regard to the verbs AVOIR and ETRE; for one or the other of them appears in almost every sentence that you see in any book. To fix a thing in your memory, there is nothing like making it with your hand. A perfect familiarity with Trouver will make you master of the changes belonging to about eight-ninths of the whole of the French verbs; and a similar familiarity with avoir and ître will go far towards removing every difficulty with regard to the verbs. Let me, therefore, beg of you to seeme this important point before you proceed any further.

LETTER X.

ETYMOLOGY OF ADVERBS.

My dear Richard,

- 142. In paragraph 37 I explained to you why the words belonging to this part of speech are called Adverbs. You will, of course, now read that paragraph again. Having read it, you will want nothing more to inform you of the nature and use of the words of this part of speech.
- 143. Adverbs undergo no changes of form, like the parts of speech which we have heretofore had to do with. Therefore this sort of words will not detain us long. The main part of our English adverbs end in LY; as, happily, shortly. They are formed, in most cases, from adjectives, as in these two instances, from happy and short. It is nearly the same in the French, except that, instead of ly they add ment; as, heureusement (happily), courtement (shortly); from hereuse (happy), and courte (short).
- 144. The Syntax will teach us how to place and employ Adverbs in sentences: here we have only to ascertain how the Adverbs themselves are formed, and what connection they have with other words. And as to this matter, there are a few observations to make:
 - First. The general rule is, to add ment to the adjective to make it an adverb; as, brave, bravement; but, if the adjective end in é (with an accent, mind), or in i or u, it is to the masculine of the adjective that the ment is added. Adjectives ending in e mute are, as you have before seen, for both genders; and the ment is merely added to them to form the adverb. When the adjective ends in a consonant, the adverb is formed by adding ment to the feminine of it. The following five words will suffice in the way of example. I shall give the English of the Adverb only:

ADJEC	CTIVES.	ADVERBS.
Masc.	Fem.		1
aisé,	aisée,	aiscment,	easily.
joli,	jolie,	joliment,	prettily.
goulu, .	goulue,	goulument,	gluttonously.
vite,	vite,	vîtement,	quickly.
dur,	dure,	durement,	hardly.

This taking the feminine, and not the masculine, of the adjective, whereon to form the adverb, is particularly to be observed in those eases where the masculine differs widely in form from the feminine; as, franc, franche; doux, douce; heureux, heureuse; for here it must be, not francment, but franchement, doucement, heureusement. To the above rule there are, however, a few exceptions. The following adjectives, though ending with a consonant, or with u, take an é, î, or û before the meat:

ADJECTIVES.	ADVERBS.
Exprès,	expressement,	expressly.
confus,	confusement,	confusedly.
précis,	precisément,	precisely.
commun,	communement,	commonly.
importun,	importunément,	importunately.
obscur,	obscurément,	obscurely.
profond,	profondément,	dceply.
gentil,	gentîment,	genteelly.
epérda,	eperdûment,	desperately.
ingénn,	ingenûment,	ingenuously.
du,	dûment,	duly.
assidv,	assidûment,	assiduously.

A further exception is, that the following adjectives, though ending in e mute, do not, like vite, which becomes vitement, keep the e mute in forming the adverb; but change the e mute into an é acute:

ADJECTIVES.	ADVERBS.
Aveugle,	aveuglément,	blindly.
commode,	commodément.	commodiously.
conforme,	conformément,	conformably.
énorme,	énormément,	enormously.

The words derived from any of these follow the same rule, incommodément, which is derived from incommode, and that from commode.—For unpunished, or with impunity, the French have impunément, though the adjective is impuni.

SECOND. When the adjectives end in ant and ent, they form the adverbs by changing the ant into amment and the ent into emment; as, indépendant (independent), indépendamment (independently), prudent (prudent), prudemment (prudently). To this rule there are two exceptions. Lent (slow) makes lentement, and présent (present) makes présentement.

145. As to the other adverbs, I mean such as are not derived from, or made out of adjectives, they are words of themselves, and, like other words, are to be sought for in the Dictionary. There are, perhaps, a hundred of them. For inserting a list of them here there can be no reason which would not be a reason for inserting the whole of the nonus and adjectives and of all the other parts of speech. We ought to do nothing without a reason, and to swell the bulk of a book, less, perhaps, than almost any other thing. An adverb is a word that never changes its form on account of person, number, gender, time, or any other circumstance. It is always composed of the same letters; and, therefore, there need not be much time employed upon explanations relative to this Part of Speech. The French adverbs differ widely from ours; they are used in a manner very different from that in which ours are used; but they cannot all be put into the head at once: they and their several uses must be learned by translating, by writing, by speaking, by reading them in books, as they occur, and not by attempting to know them all at once by arranging them and reading them in lists.

146. There are Adverbs of time, place, order, quality, and of manner; but any classification of them would be useless, because they undergo no changes. There are Nouns of time, place, order, and the rest; but we do not class them as such, because they undergo no changes to suit these various circumstances. The negatives are of this part of speech; and the use of them is a great matter; but they never change their form; they cannot be used without other words; and, in fact, all relating to them is to be learned when we come to employ them in sentences. The manner of using negatives is a great matter, and it will be treated of in a separate Letter. A whole Letter (XX.) will be devoted to negative and interrogative sentences.

147. The French, like the English, have two or three Adverbs that may be said to have degrees of comparison. We have, in English, teell, which becomes better, and best. The French have bien (well), mieux (better), le mieux (the best). They have also mal (badly), pis (worse), le pis (the worst). They have peu (little or few), moins (less), le moins (the least). We have often, which becomes oftener and oftenest. But they say souvent, plus souvent, le plus souvent. These irregularities are, however, very few in number; and, as they are confined to words which frequently occur in almost every page of every book, and it every conversation of any considerable length, they very soon cease to present any thing like a difficulty to the learner.

148. It may be necessary to observe here, that an adverb sometimes consists of more than one word. It is then called a compound adverb. We have the same thing in English; but it may be useful to explain the matter. Lately, for instance, is a simple adverb; but little-by-little is a compound. In French it is much about the same. For lately they have dernièrement, and for little-by-little they have petit-à-petit; that is to say, word for word, little-to-little; which, odd as it sounds, has a sense in it more evident than is the sense in our adverb. Sometimes, however, the French adverb is a compound when ours is not: as, tout-à-coup, which means suddenly, and, word for word, all-at-astroke, or at a lit. And indeed we sometimes say. all-of-a-studden, instead of studdenly. Sometimes ours is a compound, when the French is not: as, now-a-days. which they express by aujourd'hui. Thus you see there are, in many cases, several words that go to the making up of one adverb. In our now-a-days, for instance, there is the adverb now; then there is the a (meaning in this case at); then there is the noun days. You will bear this in mind. Though there are several. words, and of different parts of speech too, they make but one adverb.

149. Sometimes, both in French and in English, the words that are used to make a compound adverb are connected by a hyphen or hyphens: as, now-a-days and tout-à-l'houre. But this is not always the case. For instance, avec le temps, and in time, which latter expresses the meaning of the former, are compound adverbs; and yet we do not connect by hyphens the words that compose them. In the meanwhile is really no more than a compound adverb, and yet we do not use the hyphens in writing it. This adverb is translated into French by the single word cependant. And it is, if we look into the matter, curious to observe, how fully this one word contains the meaning of our four words. It is ce and pendant; that is to say, this and during; that is to say, during this; that is to say, in the mean, or middle, while, or time.

- 150. There are some Adjectives which are used as Adverbs; and this is the case in both languages; as, parler bas, to speak low; that is to say, in a low voice. This is not frequently the case; and, perhaps, we use this way of speaking when we ought not. We often use the word bad, when we ought to use badly. The French say voir double (to see double), and so do we; but, strictly speaking, this double is not an adverb so much as it is an adjective and a noun; for it means double things. However, there are not many words used in this way; and you will soon become acquainted with them all.
- 151. I cannot conclude this Letter, without observing to you, that words which, in some cases, are adverbs, are, in other cases, not adverbs. For instance, the inside, when thus written, is a noun, though inside is, in some cases, an adreib. It is the same with the French, who say, le dedans (the inside), le dehors (the outside), and so on, just as we do. This circumstance was noticed in paragraphs 42 and 43, which you ought to look at again.

LETTER XI.

ETYMOLOGY OF PREPOSITIONS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

152. In paragraph 38, I explained to you why words of this sort were called Prepositions. The chief use of the words of this part of speech is, to express the different relations and connections which Nouns have with each other, or in which Nouns stand with regard to each other: the hawk sits upon the tree, the hawk flies to the tree, the hawk flies down from the tree, the hawk flies over the tree.

153. Prepositions never change their form, so that there are none of those difficulties attending them which we find in the Articles, Nouns, Pronouns, Adjectives, and Verbs, which change their forms so many times. For instance, sur (upon) is always sur, whether it be before a noun masculine, or a noun feminine, or before a singular or a plural. Let me here, however, make a remark or two with regard to d and de. The first of these answers to our to, and the last to our of. Each has different meanings under different circumstances; but, generally speaking, our to and of are translated by these words; as, I send ten of my slicen to the farm. J'envoie dix de mes moutons à la ferme. But I have here to call your recollection to what was 'said in paragraphs 79 to 86, and to beg of you to read, before you go any further, the whole of these eight paragraphs carefully through. You will, doubtless, have done this already; but you must now do it again.

154. Here you see, then, that à and de are, in French, sometimes united with the definite article. This, however, is the case with regard to no other of the prepositions. To be sure, the article, thus united with these prepositions, is a thing of most extensive use in the language. Scarcely a sentence can you write without using it in some one or other of its forms; but this is, in fact, an advantage in the learning of its use. The de becomes d' when it is immediately followed by a word beginning with a rowel or with an h mute; but this is, in fact, no change in the form of the word. It is merely an abbreviation, made for the purpose of obtaining fullness of sound.

155. In this part of speech, as well as in the Adverbs, there are sometimes more than one word; that is to say, one preposition contains more than one word; as, ris-à-vis, which, in English, is over-against. But, sometimes, the Preposition, like the Adverb, is simple in one of the languages and compound in the other. For instance: par dessous (under); selon (according to). The same word is, as was before observed, sometimes of one part of speech and sometimes of another; and this is very frequently the case with these parts of speech, which have no variation in the forms of the words. But this is a matter of little consequence; you will soon learn to distinguish one part of speech from the other. I hope, indeed, that you have nearly done this already.

156. One of the chief things belonging to Prepositions is that which is called their governing. They are said to govern nouns and pronouns; that is to say, to cause them to be in the objective case. You must now look, back to paragraphs 72 to 76. Then go to paragraph 91. Read these all carefully over again now; and when you have done that, you will find that the Prepositions govern, in certain cases, the nonus and pronouns.

157. The main thing of all, however, to be observed on, under this head, is the different application of the prepositions in the two languages. To, as we have seen, is generally expressed in French by a. when this à is used with the verb to think (penser), for instance, it is not expressed in English by to. For example, the French say, je pense à ma santé; that is to say, word for word, I think to my health. But we say, I think of my health. Now, if you reflect a little here, you will find that this French phrase is by no means unreasonable; for it is, in its fullness, this: I apply my thinking to my health. And our English phrase means: I think, or use my thinking faculties about things concerning my health, or of, or belonging The meaning, when you come to to, my health. examine the thing well, is the same; the mode of expression only is different; but this difference must be very carefully attended to; for, though I think of my health is good English, je pense de ma santé is not French at all, any more than, I think to my health is English.

158. It is the same with regard to the use of many other Prepositions. For example, we say, I play on the flute; but the French say, je joue de la flûte; that is to say, I play of the flute. We say, to enjoy a thing: the French say, jouir d'une chose; that is, to enjoy of a thing. We say, near a thing, or near to: they say, es d'une chose; that is, near of a thing. Près de la ville mear to the town. Près de dix mois; nearly, or near to, ten months. Near of ten months seems to be nonsense; but it is not; it means near to the number of ten months; or, near to the quantity of time that makes up ten months. The meaning, when you come closely to examine into the matter, is the same in both languages; the manner of expressing that meaning is very different; and this difference must be strictly attended to.

159. In this respect the Preposition is, in the learning of French, an important part of speech; because, though it never changes its form, it is used in a manner so very different, in many cases, from that in which it is used in English. The Syntax will show more fully this difference, which, as I have just said, is a very important matter.—See Paragraph 453.

160. Prepositions are not, like Nouns, Adjectives, Verbs, and Adverbs, a very numerous class of words. I shall, therefore, give a list of the greater part of them here, divided into two parts. There are some of the Prepositions which are directly followed by the Noun or Pronoun; and others which must have the preposition de before the next Noun or Pronoun. I shall divide them according to this difference in the manner of using them. I shall also give the English of each phrase. Observe, that the Frenchi de answers to our from as well as of. Observe, also, that when I say that the following prepositions are immediately followed by the noun or pronoun that they govern, I do not mean to shut out the Article, for it, in fact, makes a part of . the noun. Nor do I mean to exclude the possessive pronoun. H est à la foire; il est DANS sa chambre,

You must never forget, that the same assemblage of letters may, in some cases, be a preposition, and, at einer times, may not be a preposition. Indeed, this has been pointed out to you so many times, that the doing of it here may seem to be useless; but it is a thing that you cannot be too well acquainted with.

Besides the above, there are three or four that require à before the succeeding Noun or Pronoun. These are jusque (as far as), which is written jusqu' because the à follows; as, jusqu' à la rivière: as far as the river. Par rapport à sa maison: with respect to his house. Quant à son argent: as for his money.

161. Before you go further, it will be well for you to read over several times these lists of Prepositions. Copy them, that is to say, write them down, many times over; so that you may not only know them again as soon as they meet your eye; but that you may be able to write them correctly, with all their hyphens, elisions, and accents; for these are of as much importance as are the letters of which the words are composed. Let it be your constant habit to write in a plain hand. The best hand-writing is that which the easiest to read; that which can be the most easily read by the greatest number of persons. Take care to put all the marks and accents; for though Frenchmen, when they write, seldom do it, they ought to do it; and, in your case, the omission would, and must, retard your learning: for the omission really makes, in many cases, nonsense of the whole thing that you are writing. Des is from the time, and Des is of the, or some. Then again, A is has, and A is to. The LA is the, and the LA is there. This is sufficient to show how necessary it is not to omit accents. Besides, all writing ought to be operect in all its parts; and as there is, in this case, noting but mere attention required of you, not to do the thing properly would argue that sort of disposition which, I am sure, will never be discovered in my dear Richard. If you have a teacher, these lists are excellent things as reading lessons. They contain words that are seen in every sentence, and that you cannot open your mouth without using. But, whether you have a teacher or not, write these lists down several times over.

LETTER XII.

ETYMOLOGY OF CONJUNCTIONS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- 162. The reason why words of this part of speech are called Conjunctions, has been given you in paragraph 39. They connect, or conjoin, or join together, words and sentences. They, like adverbs and prepositions, never change their form; and are, therefore, not attended with any particular difficulty.
- 163 Some of them are called copulative and others obsjunctive; the former couple nouns and pronouns together in sense as well as in place; as, the field and the house are sold. The others disjoin them in the sense; as, the field is sold, but the house is not. There is, perhaps, no great practical utility in this distinction; but it being a distinction usually made, I have just noticed it. Some teachers of Grammar divide Conjunctions into six or seven classes; but this is of no use, and, therefore, I avoid it.
- 164. A thing much more useful than this is, to observe, that the same word is sometimes a Conjunction, sometimes an Adverb, and sometimes a Preposition. It is the sense in which the word is used that determines the part of speech to which it belongs. Some of the Conjunctions are simple; as, comme (as), and some compound; as, au lieu de (instead of). A phrase of considerable length is frequently no more than one Conjunction: as, posez le cas que, which may be translated into English by the simple word suppose.

Poser is to lay down. So that the whole of the phrase means this: lay down the case that. We, for instance, say, no English, suppose that the enemy declare war. The French say, posez les cas que l'ennemi déclare la guerre. But they can say, as well as we, supposez que: And we can say, as well as they, suppose the case that.

165. When a Conjunction, an Adverb, or a Preposition, consists of several words, you must take care how you give to each of the words the meaning which it would have in its distinct state. They sometimes have this meaning, but they more frequently have not. For instance, we have in English this Conjunction, as well as, and we use it thus: I was drunk as well as you. But what is there well here? Here is something very bad, but nothing at all well. We know that these three words, taken together, mean in like manner with, or, in like degree with. But when we find, in French, anssi bien que, we are apt to give to each word its separate meaning, and then they are, also well that, which is not their meaning. They mean the same as our as well as.

166. I shall now insert the principal part of the Conjunctions in alphabetical order, with the English against each.

167. Conjunctions govern modes of verbs: that is to say, some Conjunctions have one mode after them, and some another mode; but the full explanation of this matter must be left till I come to Letter XXVII., in which I shall treat of the Syntax of Conjunctions. The above list contains the far greater part of the Con-You will observe, that many of these words are, as I observed before, sometimes Prepositions and sometimes Adverbs. The words of these two last parts of speech are few in number, compared with the others, the Articles and Pronouns excepted; and, therefore, they may be all written down many times over without much labour. You will observe, that these are words incessantly recurring; that there can hardly ever be a sentence without one or more of them in it; and that the sooner you become acquainted with them all, the better. As I observed in the case of the Prepositions, take care, in writing the words, to put all the hyphens, elisions, and accents.

LETTER XIII.

ON PARSING.

My DEAR RICHARD,

168. You have now gone through the whole of the Etymology. The object of this part of the Grammar has been to teach you to distinguish one sort of words, or part of speech, from each of the others; and also to teach you how to make the several changes in the spelling of the words. The Syntax, when you come to it, will teach you how to choose your words in the making of sentences, and also how to place them. As yet you cannot know how to write French correctly; how to make a French sentence; but, before you go any further, I shall give you an Exercise in Parsing, which will lead you to reconsider what you have learned.

169. To Parse, is to put into parts. It comes from the Latin word pars, which means part. There is a French word, parsemer, which means, to scatter, or put asunder. And this word, to parse, is used by grammarians to denominate the act of taking the words of a sentence, one by one, and writing against each the part of speech that it belongs to. Thus: I write a letter to you. I is a personal pronoun; write is a verb; A is an article; letter is a noun; to is a preposition; you is a personal pronoun. The same sentence in French would be, Je vous écris une lettre. The JE and yous are personal pronouns; écris is a verb; une is an article; lettre is a noun; and, you see, there is no preposition; for in this case rous means to you. We can say the same thing without the preposition; as, I write you a letter. But we cannot say, I you write a letter. These latter remarks do not, however, belong to the subject immediately before us, though they may serve to make an opening and to smooth the way to the Syntax. Before you go any further, look again at paragraph 42, and attend well to what you find there. As you proceed in this work of parsing, I beg you to try yourself in the manner pointed out in paragraph 42.

170. I shall now give you a series of sentences to parse. They will be of very simple construction. I shall give the French as well as the English of each sentence. The first sentence I shall parse myself; and you will proceed with the rest, and go patiently through the whole of the sentences, taking word by word, writing them down, and writing against them in the manner that you will find in the example that I am about to give you. You have been told before, that you are never to expect that a phrase, however short it may be, is to be translated from one language into the other, word for word. You will now see that this is the ease. I shall mark these little exercises A. B, C, and so on; in order that I may easily refer you to them, if necessary. When you have gone through one of these little exercises, you ought, where you have any doubt, to look at the Dictionary. It will tell you whether you have done the Exercise properly. But look well at each word before you write against it. Consider well its meaning and the function it performs in this particular case. One exercise done with care is worth a thousand done earclessly.

171. If you examine well the words of these two little pieces of writing, the examination will show you a great deal as to the difference in the two languages. Look at the closing parts, for instance. The French say, it le fait mieux; that is, he does it better; but we say, it does it better. The Canary-bird is a he in French, and an it in English; and you see the French put the words in an order very different from that which we employ.

172. Now proceed in the same way with the little pieces of French and English which follow here. They have been selected for their cleamess and simplicity. The English and French both are given, in order that you may compare the one with the other. The translation is not clegant, but as literal as it could be made without making the English a sort of broken English. Instead of saying, "The Canary-bird is, after the "Nightingale, the bird which sings the best, and "which has the strongest voice:" instead of this, it might have been thus; "Except the Nightingale, the "Canary is the best singing-bird, and has the strongest "voice." This would have been rather better English: but in order to make the matter as little difficult as possible for you, the translation has been made, as nearly as I could well make it, word for word: .but to, you see, it is not word for word, even in this simple instance.

173. The way to proceed with the following sentence is precisely that which has been just pointed out inparagraph 170. And let me beg of you not to slurthis business over, but go patiently through it, writing down, in a plain hand, all the sentences, English as well as French; and when you have parsed one of the sentences, examine it by the Dictionary, to see whether what you have done be correctly done. Paragraphs 42 and 43 contain matter which you should now have fresh in your mind. Read, therefore, those two paragraphs again very attentively, and, while you are at your work of parsing, act according to what is stated in those paragraphs; for, unless you attend to that, your parsing cannot be correct, and you will not profit, in the degree you ought to profit, from your labour.

LETTER XIV.

RELATING TO THE GENDERS OF NOUNS, AND TO THE CONJUGATIONS AND THE IRREGULARITIES OF VERBS.

My DEAR RICHARD,

174. I now come to those cumbrous masses of words, which, if they had been introduced before, would have wholly broken asunder that chain of justruction which I wished to keep entire. In paragraphs 64 and 65 I put off, as you will recollect, what I had further to say on the Genders of Nouns; and you will also recollect that, in paragraphs 121 and 122, I put off what I had further to say on the TEN CONJUGATIONS OF REGULAR VERBS, and on the IRREGULAR VERBS. If you now read again paragraph 122, it will not be necessary for me to say, in this place, anything further respecting my reasons for having thus postponed the details upon these three subjects. These details I shall now give, under the three heads just named; and I call these so many TASKS, because this word implies a rather laborious affair. Indeed, that which you will find pointed out by this letter is mere labour for the hand, the eye, and the memory. The Genders of Nouns belonged to the Etymology of Nouns; the Conjugations and Irregularities of Verbs belonged to the Etymology of Verbs; and the principles relating to them were sufficiently dwelt on in the proper places: but the details, the lists, the more memory part, could not be gone into there, without making, in your study of principles, chasms too wide. Having gone through the Etymology of all the sorts of words, or parts of speech, we come to a proper place for introducing these details; for, though they are matters for the memory only, they ought to be pretty well secured before we go further in advance. When we have secured them we shall enter upon the SYNTAX; and shall find it, I trust, a matter of pleasure rather than of toil.

175. Our first task is, then, the ascertaining of the Genders of Nouns. Now read paragraphs from 54 to 65, both inclusive, carefully through. When you have done that, look attentively at paragraph 64 once more; for I am now going to give you a specimen of my way of going to work as I have described it in this lastmentioned paragraph. I shall begin with letter A of the Dictionary; that is to say, with the beginning. I shall, in giving you this specimen, take some nouns that begin with that letter. Then take some that begin with B; and so on, till I have gone through the alphabet.

176. The Task is, simply that of writing down in alphabetical order, in a little blank book, all the nouns in the language; and just putting le or la before each, according to the gender. In the Dictionary you will find against each noun s. m. or s. f., that is to say, substantive (or noun) masculine; or substantive (or noun) feminine. And when you write the nouns in your book, you will put before each the le or the la according as you find the noun to be a masculine or a feminine.

177. But you cannot go through the whole of the Dictionary precisely in this way; for, if the noun begin with a vowel, or with an h mute, the definite article for both genders is l. Therefore, in these cases, that is to say, as to the nouns beginning with a, e, i, o, u, and h mute, you must use the indefinite article, un or une.

178. Then, again, there are some nouns which begin with a vowel, and which have neither plural nor singular; as, argent. We cannot say un argent. So that, in such a case as this, the best way will be to put the adjective good (bon or bonne) before the noun; and that will very plainly mark the gender.

179. There are, besides, some few nouns that are plural and never singular; as, vivres, victuals. Now, the plural definite article, les, is for both genders. In such cases, also, you must put the adjective, as in the case of argent; and thus you will, of course, write, de bon argent, de bons vivres; but, when you have so write down water and snuffers, you will write de bonne eau, and de bonnes mouchettes.

180. I have not put the English opposite the French. It is of no use in this case. It can only add to the labour, and thereby cause a loss of time. The object is to get the genders of the nouns well fixed in your memory; and for the doing of this there is nothing like the writing of the thing down. But, let me now give the little specimen that I have been talking of; and, when I have done that, I have another remark or two to make on the subject.

une aune: an ell.	la babine,	la caque.
de bon argent.	le bac.	le couteau.
D.	E.	F.
le daim.	de bonne eau.	de bon froment.
Ie damas.	une ébauche.	Ia framboise
Ia ganse.	un éblouissement.	Io framboisier.

181. In paragraphs 178 and 179, I directed you to take the adjective good (bon or bons, bonne or bonnes); but in some cases this adjective would make nonsense of the phrase. It is very well to say, de bon babeurre, good buttermilk; but it would be nonsense to say, de bonnes vacances, good holidays. Therefore I have put longues before vacances, which denotes the gender as clearly as the adjective bonnes would do it.

182. You will observe, that I have merely given a specimen under each letter of the alphabet. I have not tallen the nouns which stand first under each letter; but you will begin at the first noun under A, and will write down every one in the order in which you find it in the Dictionary. Observe, however, that where the same noun has several distinct significations. and is therefore repeated several times in the Dictionary, as in the case of the noun mot, you need write the word down but once; unless, indeed, as is sometimes the case, the same noun, that is to say, a noun consisting of the same letters, and those letters placed in the same order, be masculine in one sense, and feminine in another. This is the case with regard to the two norms which stand first under the letter A in the foregoing specimens; and also in the case of the two first nouns under the letter L. When this is the case it will be useful to write down the English of the words as I have done in the two cases just pointed out.

183. Now, this is the TASK; and some labour it certainly does require; but it does not require any great degree of labour. The whole of the nouns may be written down, in this way, in six days. But when I had written the whole down upon paper of the common size, I copied them into a little book, made of very thin paper, three inches long and two wide. I divided the pages of this book each into two columns, and each column had about thirty nouns. This little book was always about me. It went into my poeket-book, and did not, perhaps, weigh the twentieth part of an omce. Sitting, walking, riding; whatever my situation, I could always refer to my little book in a moment. This method is, therefore, the one that I beg you to pursue. Once more let me remind you of the necessity of writing down the words correctly. You must not omit any of the accents; for they, as you have seen before, are, in some cases, of as much importance as the letters. Write in a plain hand. Writing may be neat and plain, though very small, which yours must be when you come to put the nouns into the little book before mentioned.

184. Having performed this TASK, which may possibly require ten days to do it well, and to make your little book in a very neat manner, you will proceed to the next TASK; but before you do this, spend two days in reading through all the foregoing THIRTEEN LETTERS: because, by the end of the ten days, which the list of nonns will demand, it will be necessary to bring your mind back to the previous part of the Grammar. Having read carefully through the whole of the Grammar up to this place, having taken this review of your labours, you will proceed to the next TASK, which is by no means less necessary, but is much less laborious.

185. The Conjugation of Regular Verbs forms the subject of the second TASK. In paragraph 118, I have explained the meaning of the word Conjugation, and have given you the conjugation of an English Verb and of a French Verb. In paragraphs 120 and 121, I have spoken of the ten Conjugations of French Verbs, and, in paragraph 122, I have spoken of the Irregular Verbs. Read all these paragraphs carefully through now Pay great attention to all that they contain; and, when you have gone through them in this careful manner, you will be ready to enter on the ten conjugations.

186. If I had to make a dictionary, I would make but two conjugations; but I must take the Dictionary as I find it. It is, however, a matter of little consequence, so that we attend to what we are about. The French vcrbs are, as was observed in paragraph 121, considered as divided into ten conjugations. These are denoted in the Dictionary by the figures 1, 2, 3, and so on to 10. You have seen that a French verb takes more than thirty different forms. These forms are different according to the different conjugations. You have seen that TROUVER (to find) becomes trouve, trouvons, trouvez, trouvent. But AGR (to act) becomes, in some cases, agis, agissons, agissez, agissent. The changes in this last verb arc very different from those in the former These two verbs are said to belong to different conjugations, because the changes in one of them are different from the changes in the other; and if you look into the Dictionary you will find the figure I after TROUVER, and the figure 2 after AGIR; because the former verb is of the first and the latter of the second conjugation. [It is not, however, in all dictionaries that these indications will be found.]

187. You will now be ready to ask, what are the marks which designate the conjugations; that is to say, what is it that makes us say, that this verb belongs to such a conjugation, and that that verb belongs to such other conjugation? The designating marks are the endings of the verbs; and the method adopted has been this: to call the verbs ending in er verbs of the first conjugation, those in ir of the second, in tir of the third, in enir of the fourth, in evoir of the fifth, in aire of the sixth, in indre of the seventh, in ottre of the eighth, in uire of the ninth, in dre of the tenth.

188. But you may say, What is the use of all this classifying? Oh! a great deal of use, as I will now show you. Suppose you have to translate this phrase, you find a sheep; you write, yous trouvez un mouton;

then this phrase, you act well; you, if you paid no attention to conjugation, would write, vons agiz bien. But, knowing by its ending that agir is of the second conjugation, and having learned the manner of making the changes in the verbs of that conjugation, you would write, not agiz, but agissez.

189. What you have now to do, then, is to learn the manner of making the changes in the verbs of all these ten conjugations. In order to teach you this, I shall take one verb of each of the ten conjugations, and conjugate it all through; that is to say, exhibit it in all its forms, from that of the Infinitive Mode to that of the Participle, in the same manner that I have exhibited the verb Trouver, in paragraph 118. The verbs which I shall take for this purpose are the following:

1. TROUVER,	to find.
2. AGIR,	to act.
3. MENTIR,	to lie.
4. VENIR.	to come.
5. DEVOIR.	to owe.
6. FAIRE,	to make, or do
7. Joindre,	to join.
8. Croitre.	to grow.
9. Cuire,	to cook.
10. VENDRE,	to sell.

Here is one verb of each of the ten conjugations; and if you were to look out these verbs in the Dictionary, you would find a figure against each agreeing with what you see here. (See the note at end of paragraph 186.) Bear in mind, then, that the verbs of the first conjugation end in er, those of the second in ir, of the third in tir, the fourth in enir, the fifth evoir, the sixth aire, the seventh oindre, the eighth oître, the ninth uire, and the tenth endre and ondre.

190. There will be some remarks to make upon each conjugation, and in order that all may be as plain as possible, I shall make one place contain the remarks on each conjugation, and shall exhibit a verb regularly conjugated on the opposite page; so that when you turn over the leaf, you will come to a fresh conjugation.

191. FIRST CONJUGATION. Paragraphs 121 and 122 have explained to you what Irregular Verbs are; and you are to observe, that there are some of those of each Conjugation. But, besides these irregulars, there are some little irregularities in several of the verbs of this first conjugation.

FIRST. When there is a g immediately before the er, the e is not dropped in those parts of the verb which require an o or an a to come after the g. In NAGER (to swim), for instance, we should, if we followed the general rule, say, je nagais: but this would introduce the hard sound of gais: we therefore say, je nageais. And in the active participle we say, nageant, and not nagant.

SECOND. When a question is asked, and the verb is immediately followed by the pronoun je, the e is changed into an é; as, trouvé-je? Find I? THIRD. Verbs which end in uyer, oyer, ayer, and eyer, are, by some writers, made to change the y into i, in those parts of the verb where the y comes immediately before an e mute; and therefore, instead of je paye (I pay), such writers use je paie. The verb envoyer (to send) makes enverrai, in the future, and enverrais in the past of the subjunctive.

FOURTH. The verbs appeler (to eall) and jeter (to throw) double the l and the t in those parts of the verb which take an e mute immediately after the l and t; as, j appelle, and not j appele; je jette, and not je jete. This is the case in a very few other instances.

FIFTH. When the verb ends in cer, the c must have a cédille placed under it, when it is immediately followed by an a or an o; as, tracer (to trace), je traçais, il traça. These irregularities amount to very little; and all the verbs in er are to be considered as regular, except ALLER and PUER.

Sixth. In the part of the verb which ends with a vowel, and which, when a question is asked, is followed by il or elle, there must be a t put between the verb and the il or elle, with a double hyphen; thus, trouve-t-il? does he find? trouva-t-il? did he find? This is merely for the sake of the sound, which without the t would be very disagreeable.

192. SECOND CONJUGATION. The verbs of this conjugation end (in their infinitive mode) in ir. There are, however, two other conjugations which end in ir; namely, the third and the fourth, as you have secn in paragraph 189. But these two end in tir and enir. Of the second conjugation, the verb on the following page is one. There are about 200 verbs of this second conjugation .- In the Subjunctive Mode a que is understood always; as, que j'agisse, that I may act. This matter will be fully explained in Letter XXIV., where I shall show how the French supply the place of these little words.-It may be useful to add a word or two here about the PARTI-CIPLES. The active participle, as TROUVANT, AGISSANT, never changes its form [see, however, paragraph 436]; but the passive participle does change its form in some cases. Trouvé, for instance, is the passive participle of the verb Trouver; but this participle is sometimes trouvé, at others trouvés, at others trouvée, and at others trouvées. When the passive participle ought to change its form, and when it ought not, is not to be learned by us without great attention. This matter, which is of the first importance, I shall treat of fully in the Syntax of Verbs, in Letter XXIII. The changes in the form of the passive participle are not given in the conjugations, because the participle is not always subject to change. The changes depend upon the construction of the sentence in which the participle is used; and you have not yet come to the construction of sentences.

193. THIRD CONJUGATION. These are verbs in tir, though it ought to be observed that there are some of the verbs of the second conjugation which end in tir. However, this can produce no mistake, because I shall here subjoin a list of all the verbs of this conjugation.—There are THIRTEEN of them; and they are as follows:

Consentir, Démentir, Desservir, Mentir, Partir, Pressentir, Repartir,	to consent, to give the lie. to clear the table. to lie. to set out. to foresee. to set out again.	Ressentir, Ressortir, Sentir, Servir, Repentir, (Se)	to resent. to go out again. to feel. to serve. to repent. to go out.
---	--	--	--

You will see that several of these verbs are derived from others of them; as, repartir comes from partir. have, however, placed them here in alphabetical order.-I must also observe that the English is not, in these cases, always a full translation of the French. Sentir, for instance, means, sometimes, to smell; and répartir, with the accent, means to divide or distribute. while without the accent (repartir) it means to reply, to set out again.—But these matters you will soon become well acquainted with by those frequent references to the Dictionary which will be required when you come to translate. At present you have more to do with the forms of words, and with the changes in those forms, than with the various meanings of words. -Paragraph 115 should be read with attention. The observations which it contains relative to the manner of using the will, shall, and so forth, apply to all the conjugations. -- Small letters have, at the beginning of words, been used as much as possible, instead of capitals, in order to save room.

194. FOURTH CONJUGATION. The verbs of this conjugation end in entr; as you see in the case of venir. There are twenty-four of them, as follows:

Abstenir, (S')	to abstain.	Parvenir,	to succeed.
· Appartenir,	to belong.	Prévenir.	to prevent.
Contenir.	to contain.	Provenir.	to result from.
Contrevenir,	to contravene.	Retenir,	to retain.
Convenir,	to agree to.	Ressouvenir, (Se)	to call to mind.
Détenir.	to detain.	Revenir,	to come back,
Devenir.	to become.	Soutenir.	to sustain.
Disconvenir,	to dissent from.	Souvenir, (Se)	to remember.
Entretenir,	to keep up.	Subvenir.	to come to the help of.
Intervenir.	tó intervene.	Survenir.	to happen.
Maintenir.	to maintain.	Tenir.	to hold.
Ootenir.	to obtain.	Venir.	to come.

Here are, in fact, but two original verbs, all the other twenty-two being partly made out of them; and it is curious enough, that these two should be the two last upon the list. Every one of these verbs expresses something about holding or coming. Abstenie is to back hold, or hold back. APPARTENIR is to apart hold, or hold apart. or, rather, to be held apart. MAINTENIR is to hand hold, or hold fast, or firmly. INTERVENIR is to come between. PARVENIR is to come by, or at. PRÉVENIR is to come This is, too, the meaning of our word prevent; and hence, in one of the prayers of the Liturgy, we say, "Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doing;" that is to say, come before us, or lead, or guide us .- I observed, in paragraph 193, that some of the verbs, in all these lists, had other meanings besides those expressed by the English words put against them. Such is remarkably the case of this verb prévenir, which means (besides to prevent) to apprize, to anticipate, to be before-hand with. Bear this in mind; for it will be of great use to you when you come to translate.

195. FIFTH CONJUGATION. This consists of verbs ending in evoir. There are but six of them. It was hardly worth while to make a conjugation of these; but it has been done in the Dictionary which is the most in use, and therefore I do it here. These six verbs are:

Apercavoir, (S') to perceive, to conceive, to conceive, Recevoir, to owe. Redevoir, to owe again.

There is the verb decevoir; but it is not much used.— DEVOIR, the verb conjugated on the following page, is a verb of great use. It answers, in many cases, to our ought, and in other cases to our should. Our ought is, in fact, a part of the verb to owe, and is become ought by corruption. For instance, "I ought to write to "k you," means, that "I owe the performance of the act of "writing to you." The French phrase would be, "Je "dois vous écrire;" which is, "I owe to you to write." However, you will find more as to this matter when you get into the Syntax. Let me, as I have room in this place, remind you again of the great advantage of writing in a plain hand. You will write these conjugations down, as before directed; but if you write in a slovenly hand, you will not place the matter so safely in your memory as if you wrote in a plain and neat hand. In short, the best manner of doing a thing is, in the end, also the least troublesome and the quickest,

196. SIXTH CONJUGATION. These are the verbs ending in aire; and there are seven of them, as follows:

Contrefaire, to counterfeit.
Défaire, to undo.
Faire, to do, or to make.
Refaire, to do again.

Refaire, to do again.

You will see at once that this is, in reality, all one original verb; for every one of these verbs expresses something about doing. To counterfeit is against to do; and satisfy is enough to do, or enough doing. Doctor JOHNSON, in his Dictionary, says, that our eatisfy comes from the Latin word satisfacio; but, why, Doctor? Is not our word much more like satisfaire? Is not the fy manifestly fait, or faire? And a great number of our words come in part from this root; as feat, feasible. The country people in Hampshire commonly say, it does not fay; meaning it does not do, it does not go on well. Many of our words, ending in fy, come in part from this French word faire; and many others which end in ait or eit. Our word surfeit is, indeed, French, if the e were exchanged for an a. Sur is over, and feit (fait) is done.—But faire is, sometimes, to make: we have two verbs here to the one French verb; and, as our two verbs are words of great use, so is this French verb faire, as you will see by-and-by; therefore, take particular pains in learning to conjugate it.—It is to be observed, that in the past imperfect time of the indicative mode there are two ways of spelling this verb: je fesais, tu fesais, or, je faisais, tu faisais, and so on throughout that time. The latter form, with the ai, is more modern than that with the e.

197. SEVENTH CONJUGATION. These are verbs that end in aindre, eindre, or oindre. The difference in the ending of these makes no difference in the manner of conjugating them. But before I speak further of this, let me give you a list of the verbs of this conjugation, of which there are only FIFTEEN, as follows:

Astreindre,	to bind.	Feindre.	to feign.
Atteindre,	to reach.	Joindre.	to join.
Ceindre,	to gird.	Peindre.	to paint.
Contraindre,	to constrain.	Plaindre.	to pity.
Craindre,	to fear.	Plaindre, (Se)	to complain.
Enceindre,	to surround.	Restreindre.	to restrain.
Enjoindre,	to enjoin	Teindre,	to tint, or dye.
Eterndre	to extinguish.	H	. •

There are three or four other verbs of these terminations; but they are out of use, and therefore I will take an further notice of them. Here are three different endings, if you go back to the sixth letter from the end; but the changes of all three being the same, these verbs are all put into one conjugation. You see what the changes are in joindre. Now, suppose you have to conjugate crainlre. Je crains, je craignais, je craignis, je craindrai, and so forth. And, if you take feindre, you say, je feins, je feignais, je feignis, je feindrai. All this becomes familiar in a very short time; and especially if you write the conjugations down over and over again, and in a neat and plain hand.

198. EIGHTH CONJUGATION. The verbs of this conjugation end in outre and attre. They are NINE in number, as follows:

Acroitre, Connaître, Croître, Décroitre, Disparuitre.	to accrue. to know. to grow. to get less. to disappear.	-	Méconnoître, Paraître, Recroître, Reconnaître,	to forget. to appear. to grow again to recognize.
Disparaure.	i to disappear.	- 11		4

There are two or three law-terms, which I do not notice here. They are of no use, and can only serve to load the memory uselessly. Observe, that in some books these words have not a circumflex accent (^) over the i, but merely a single dot, as in other cases. It is, perhaps, of very little consequence; but I mention it that you may be prepared for such a case. Many French words formerly had an s where they now have none. For instance, people used to write maistre, estre, instead of maître and être; and the ^ is put to signify the omission of the s. It is the same with croître, which used to be written croistre.

199. NINTH CONJUGATION. This conjugation consists of the verbs that end in uire, which are EIGHTEEN in number, some of them having a little of irregularity, which will be noticed when I have given you the list.

Conduire,	to conduct.	Luire.	to shine, to give light.
Construire,	to construct.	Nuire.	to burt.
Cuire.	to cook.	Produire.	to produce.
Déduire.	to deduct.	Reconduire.	to reconduct.
Détruire,	to destroy.	Recuire,	to cook again.
Enduire.	to plaster over.	Reduire.	to reduce.
Induire.	to induce.	Reluire.	to glitter, to shinc.
Introduire.	to introduce.	Sednire.	to seduce.
Instrucre.	to instruct.	Truduire.	to translate.

Luire, Reluire, and Nuire, are irregular in their passive participles, where they drop the t; and instead of luii, reluit, and nuit, they make lui, relui, and nui. The passive participle is called, by some, the past participle; and the active participle is, by those persons, called the present participle. But "I was walking" is certainly not present. One of these participles always expresses action, and the other does not; therefore I use the words active and passive, as applied to these participles respectively.

200. TENTH CONJUGATION. These are verbs which end in endre and ondre. There are TWENTY-THREE of them, as follows:

Attendre.	to wait for.	Perdre.	to lose.
Condescendre.	to condescend.	Pondre.	to lay egga
Confondre.	to confound.	Prétendre.	to pretend.
Correspondre,	to correspond.	Refondre.	to recast.
Descendre.	to descend.	Lendre.	to render.
Entendre.	to hear.	Répandre.	to spread.
Etendre.	to extend.	Répondre.	to answer.
Fendre.	to split.	Tendre.	to bend.
Fondre,	to melt.	Tondre.	to shear.
Mordre.	to bite.	Tordre.	to twist.
Morfondre.	to give cold to.	Vendre.	to sell.
Pendre.	to hang.

The remarks made in paragraph 197, relative to the effect of the three different endings of the verbs of the seventh conjugation, apply to this conjugation. If it were TONDRE instead of rendre, I should say je tonds, je tondais, and so on; and in the participles I should say, tondant and tondu, instead of vendant and vendu. it is, of course, in the other eases; and, knowing how to conjugate one verb of any conjugation, you know how to conjugate, or make the changes in, all the other verbs of that conjugation.—But, there are three verbs which are deemed to be of this conjugation, and which end in rdre: perdre, mordre, tordre. They are conjugated in the same manner as rendre. They are, therefore, inserted in the above list.

201. IRREGULAR VERBS.—This is the Third Task; and it is no trifling one.—Having done with the ten eonjugations of Regular Verbs, I have next to treat of the Irregulars, of which I have spoken before, especially in paragraph 122. In paragraph 191, I observed, that there were some Irregulars of every one of the eonjugations; that is to say, that there were some verbs ending in er, some in ir, and in all the rest that were irregular; or, in other words, that did not undergo the same variation as the regular ones. Let us take a proof in Trouver (to find) and Aller (to go).

INFINITIVE MODE.

Trouver, To Find.

INDICATIVE MODE.

Present Time.

je trouve,	I find.	nous trouvons,	we find.
je vais,	I go.	nous allons,	we go.
tu trouves,	thou findest.	vous trouvez,	you find.
tu vas,	thou goest.	vous allez,	you go.
il trouve,	he finds.	ils trouvent,	they find
il va,	he goes.	ils vont,	they go.

You see here how different is the manner of making the changes in Allen from that of making them in Trouver. Indeed, you see, in some of the persons, not one letter of the word Allen left, as in vais and vont. Therefore, seeing the changes in it are not made in the same way that they are in Trouver, which is a regular verb, Allen is called an Irregular verb. As I observed to you before, there are some of these of every one of the conjugations; but I shall now give a list of the whole of the Irregulars, placed in alphabetical order. Afterwards I shall conjugate them fully;

but, first of all, I shall give a list of them. There are, however, a few other remarks to make in the way of preface to these Irregulars. There are, as you will see, THIRTY-NINE Irregulars in the list; but many of them have others derived from them; écrire, to write; souscrire, to subscribe (or underwrite); and so on. Then, there are some, even in the alphabetical list of Irregulars, which are defective; that is to say, which are not used except in some parts of them; that is, in part of the modes, or part of the times. These defective parts will be pointed out in the conjugations, but the sooner you are aware of the circumstance the better. I shall now give the list of Irregulars, with those verbs that are derived from them. This list-you will first read all through, without looking at the conjugations. Then you are to go over the list again, and you are to stop at each verb and turn to its conjugation, and go through that. Then go to the next verb; and so on, until you have in this way gone through the whole list. The conjugations will be easily referred to, because, besides the alphabetical order, they will be numbered as paragraphs, and I shall refer to them as such. I do not put avoir and être in this list; because, though they are Irregulars, all things relating to them are fully explained elsewhere.

ACQUÉRIR: To Acquire.—The following are conjugated in the same manner: conquérir, enquérir, requérir, and quérir. These are all defective verbs; that is, they are used in only part of their forms. Practice will soon teach you this.—See conjugation, Paragraph 202.

ALLER: To Go.—This is the only irregular verb of the first conjugation. There is, indeed, Pucr, which formerly was irregular in the three persons singular of the present of the indicative; but is now written je pue, tu pues, il pue, and so forth.

—See Paragraph 203.

S'ASSEOIR: To Sit down.—It has other meanings; but this you will learn from the Dictionary; and, besides, care will be taken to introduce words like this into the Exercises; so that, by the time that you have gone through the Grammar and the Exercises, you will be well acquainted with these distinctions. Surseoir is conjugated in the same way, and also seoir; but it is defective; and neither is much in use.—See Paragraph 204.

BATTRE: To Beat.—The verbs abattre, to beat, or put down; combattre, se débattre, s'ébattre, rabattre, and rebattre, are all conjugated like battre. They all, indeed, belong to that word.—Sec Faragraph 205.

BOIRE: To Drink.—Sec Paragraph 206.

BOUILLIR: To Boil.—This verb is, in French, always neuter. The French do not use it as we do: they use it only in the third person; as, il bout, it boils. They do not say, I boil the cabbage; but, je fais bouillir le chou; that is, I make the cabbage boil. The verb rebouillir means, to boil again, and it is, of course, conjugated like bouillir.—See Paragraph 207.

CONCLURE: To Conclude.—Exclure is conjugated in the same way, except that, in the passive participle, we sometimes write exclus for the masculine, and excluse for the feminine.—See Paragraph 208.

- CONVAINCRE: To Convince, is conjugated like vaincre; but it is little used in the present of the indicative mode.—See Paragraph 209.
- COUDRE: To Scw.—It is hardly necessary to say, that découdre, to unsew, and recoudre, to sew again, are conjugated in the same way as coudre.—See Paragraph 210.
- COURIR: To Run.—Accourir, concourir, encourir, discourir, parcourir, recourir, secourir, are conjugated like courir. They all come from it, and belong to it.—See Paragraph 211.
- CROIRE: To Believe.—There is the verb accroire; but it is used only in the infinitive. It must have faire with it; and then it armwers to our make believe.—See Paragraph 212.
- CUEILLIR: To Gather.—Recueillir, to gather together, or to collect, is conjugated like cucillir, as well as accueillir, to welcome, to receive kindly; but in some of its teuses we prefer making use of the verb faire with the noun accueil.—See Paragraph 213.
- DIRE: To Say.—This verb also means to tell. There are eight other verbs, which are conjugated like Dire; namely, contredire, se dédire, médire, maudire, interdire, prédire, redire, confire. But observe, all of them, except redire, make, in the second person pluval of the present time and indicative mode, disez instead of dites. Observe also, that maudire takes the double s, where there are other letters coming after the s: as, je maudis, I curse; je maudissais, I cursed.—See Paragraph 214.
- DORMIR: To Sleep .- The same manner of con-jugating is applied to endormir, s'endormir, redormir, and se rendormir.—See Paragraph 215. ÉCRIRE: To Write. - Eight others are conjugated like écrire; namely, décrire, inserire, preserire, proscrire, récrire, souscrire, transerire, cireonserire. They are all, in fact, the same word, with a preposition put before each; and they mean, to write of, to write in, to write against, to write again, to write under, to write in another place, to write round about. Besides these, there is the verb frire, to fry, conjugated like écrire; but frire is seldom used except in the singular of the indicative mode, the future, the conditional, and the passive participle. supply the tenses that are wanted, the French make use of the word faire, which they join to the infinitive, as in bouillir.—See Paragraph 216.

FUIR: To Flee.—There is s'enfuir, which means to flee from it, from this place, from that place, from something. This verb is seldom in use in the past perfect times.—See Paragraph 217.

HAÏR: To Hate.—This verb, like the last, is seldom used in the past perfect times.—Sec. Paragraph 218.

LIRE: To Read.—Élire, relire, and réélire, are conjugated in the same manner. There are two other verbs, circoncire and suffire, to eireuncise and to suffice, which are also conjugated like lire, except that, in its passive participle, the first makes circoneis, and the last suffi; and also except that, in the past perfect times, they make je circoneis, je suffis. The past perfect circon-

- cisse, suffisse; and the participle active, circoncisant, are never used, on account of their harsh sound.—See Paragraph 219.
- METTRE: To Put.—This is a verb of great use. The following eleven, all proceeding from it, are conjugated in the same way: admettre, commettre, démettre, omettre, s'entremettre, permettre, promettre, remettre, compromettre, sommettre, transmettre.—See Paragraph 220.
- MOUDRE: To Grind.—Émoudre and remoudre are conjugated like moudre.—See Paragraph 221.
- MOURIR: To Die.—See Paragraph, 222.
- MOUVOIR: To Move.—Not much used. Émouvoir, démouvoir, promouvoir, apparoir, choir, échoir, déchoir, are used merely in the infinitive. They are technical terms, and very rarely used. Mouvoir itself is nearly as little used. The verb that is generally made use of where we make use of move, is the regular, remuer.—See Paragraph 223.
- NAÎTRE: To be Born.—Renaître is conjugated like naître; but has no past perfect time. Paître and repaître are conjugated in the same way, except that in the past perfect of the subjunctive they make pusse and repusse; but these times are never used. Their passive participles are pu and repu.—Sec Paragraph 224.
- OUVRIR: To Open.—Conjugated in the same manner arc souffrir, offrir, mésoffrir, couvrir, and découvrir.—See Paragraph 225.
- PLAIRE: To Please.—There are three others, which are conjugated in the same manner: dé-

- plaire, taire, and complaire.— See Paragraph 226.
- POUVOIR: To be Able; or To have Power.—
 This is a word of great use. It sometimes supplies the place of our can and could, and may and might. This is one of the most important words in the French language; and you ought to know every part of it as well as you know your own name.—See Paragraph 227.
- PRENDRE: To Take.—The verbs which are derived from this are conjugated like it. They are, apprendre, désapprendre, comprendre, entreprendre, se méprendre, reprendre, and surprendre.—See Pavagraph 228.
- RÉSOUDRE: To Resolve.—Absoudre and dissoudre follow the same manner of conjugation. They are not, however, in use in the past perfect times, and their passive participles are absous and dissous. Soudre is used only in the infinitive.—See Paragraph 229.
- REVÊTIR: To Invest.—Vêtir and ouir follow, as far as they go, the conjugation of revêtir; but the first is used only in the infinitive, and the latter only in the passive participle.—See Paragraph 230.
- RIRE: To Laugh.—To smile is sourire, which is conjugated in the same way as rire.—See Paragraph 231.
- ROMPRE: To Break.—Corrompre and interrompre are conjugated like rompre.—See Paragraph 232.
- SAVOIR: To Know.—This is a word of great use in the French language.—See Paragraph 233.

- SUIVRE: To Follow.—Poursuivre and s'ensuivre are conjugated in the same way.—See Paragraph 234.
- TRAIRE: To Milk.—It means also to draw; and the French never say, tirer une vache (draw a cow), but they say, traire une vache. Abstraire, distraire, extraire, soustraire, and rentraire, are, as far as they go, conjugated in the same manner. But they are all defective, more or less. The first four have only the infinitive, and the singular of the present and future, in use. The last has, like traire, no past perfect times in use.—See Paragraph 235.
- TRESSAILLIR: To Burst Out, or Start.—Scillir, means to jut out, leap forth, or project. Assaillir, to assail, or fall upon.—See Paragraph 236.
- VALOIR: To be Worth.—Revaloir and prévaloir are conjugated like valoir, except that the latter makes prévale, and not prévaille, in the present time of the subjunctive mode.—See Paragraph 237.
- VIVRE: To Live.—Revivre and survivre are conjugated like vivre.—See Paragraph 238.
- VOIR: To Sec.—There are conjugated in the same manner as voir, these four: entrevoir, revoir, pourvoir, and prévoir; but observe, the two latter have their future and their past imperfect of the subjunctive in oirai, oirais, and so forth; and not in orrai, errais, like voir. Besides this, pourvoir has its past perfects in us and usse, and not in is and isse.—See Paragraph 239.
- VOULOIR: To be Willing.—This verb, like pouvoir, is of vast importance in the French language. It is used very frequently where our will occurs. It answers also to our verb to wish.

—See Paragraph 240.

Thus ends the list of Irregular Verbs. There remain a few defectives, just to notice, but not to dwell long upon. Braire, férir, bruire, faillir, clorre, éclore, gésir, tistre. These are all verbs; but too defective to merit any attempt at conjugating them. They are become a sort of adjectives. At any rate, when they occur, which is very seldom, the Dictionary will explain their meaning.—Now follow, in alphabetical order, the full conjugations of the Irregulars according to the foregoing list. I leak upon the conjugation of each of the verbs as forming a paragraph, and I number the conjugations accordingly.

241. Before I quit these conjugations of regular verbs and of irregular verbs, I must give you some further advice relative to the learning of them, and of every thing relating to the verbs. You must have seen, before now, that the verbs constitute the most important part of a language. To have a thorough knowledge of this part of speech is absolutely necessary to the acquirement of any thing approaching perfeetion in the language; I therefore beseech you to bestow great pains on this part of your study. Write down the conjugations of all the regular verbs several times over. Make it a duty to eonjugate a regular verb of each ecnjugation every day for some time. And, as to the thirty-nine Irregulars, you should conjugate them all, that is to say, write the eonjugations over so often, that at last you are able to write the whole of the conjugations down, from the first to the last, without making a single blunder; for, until you can do this, you do not understand these important words sufficiently.

242. In order to assist the memory in the ease of the Genders of Nouns, I have, in paragraph 183, described a little book that I made for the purpose. To effect a similar purpose with regard to the Veres, I made a card, which I carried constantly in my pocket-book. One side of this Card exhibited an abridgment of the ten conjugations of regular verbs. So that, if I were absent from my books; if I were walking or riding, and thinking about any particular verb, I could take out my Card, and refresh my memory. The other side of the Card exhibited a complete list of the irregulars, with an abridged conjugation of each. I shall, presently, give you a copy of this Card; and from it you may make one for yourself. On the Regular Side the Card leaves out the second persons of all the verbs; but, having all the rest under your eye, you can make no mistake as to these parts of the verb. Irregular Side of the Card you have, after the infinitive, only the first person singular of the verbs, and the two Participles. The Card will contain no more; but these will be, in most cases, sufficient to call to your recollection the manner of conjugating the verb. At any rate. this side of the Card will always be at hand to tell you whether any verb, about which you may want information, be a regular or an irregular. This Card will be very convenient when you are translating from English into French. It will, in many cases, save you the trouble of searching the Dictionary, or of turning over the leaves of your Gramman.

243. When you have done all that I have directed above, you will, before you enter on the next Letter, which will introduce you to the SYNTAX, try yourself a little as to your knowledge of the verbs; and this you will do in the following manner. Go back to paragraph 170. There are little Exercises from A to M. Write down the verbs that you find in the first; that is, in A. You will find them to be, est, chante, a, apprend, parler, sifler, and fait. Take these verbs, write them down upon a piece of paper, and, against each, write down the number of the conjugation that it belongs to, the mode, the time, the person; and, if it be an irregular, write down that, and any other particular belonging to it. I here give you an example.

a: Irregular verb; indicative mode; present time; third person singular. Part of the verb avoir.

apprend: Irregular verb; conjugated like prendre; indicative mode; present time; third person singular. Part of the verb apprendre.

parler: Regular verb; first conjugation; infinitive mode.

siffer: Regular verb; first conjugation; infinitive mode.

fait: Regular verb; sixth conjugation; indicative mode; present time; third person singular. Part of the verb faire.

244. When you have written against the verbs, look for the verbs in the Dictionary, or in your List of Irregulars, or look at your Card; and you will then find whether your descriptions be correct. When you have thus gone through one of the little Exercises, go to another, and you will get through the whole in the course of a day. These Exercises consist of sentences of very simple construction, and having a great part of their verbs in the present time; so that, when you have gone through these Exercises in the manner above pointed out, you may take the verbs which you find in any two or three pages of your Exercises in the Syntax, where you will find verbs in all the Modes and all the Times. I now give you the Card, in pages 219 and 220.

245. Before I quit the conjugations, let me once more observe, that in writing certain parts of some of the verbs, great authorities differ. I observed before, that some write je vinse, and others je vinses: some write je cous, and others je couds. There are several other verbs with regard to the writing of some parts of which there is some little difference in the practice of different writers. But this is a matter of no consequence, provided you adhere to one practice.

[Note.—It will be useful, as with the compounds of Avoir and Être, for the learner to have one example of an active verb conjugated, throughout, with Avoir, in the compound form. The verb Trouver will, therefore, be thus given, on the next page.]

LETTER XV.

SYNTAX GENERALLY CONSIDERED.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

246. In paragraph 27, which you will now read again, I described to you what Syntax meaned. It is the art of constructing sentences; it is the business of making sentences according to the rules of grammar. All that you have hitherto learned is, how to construct, or make, or form words; how to vary the spelling of articles and nouns and pronouns and adjectives to make them express the different numbers and genders and cases, and how to vary the spelling of verbs to make them express the different modes, times, and persons, and also to make your spelling accord with the rules relating to the conjugations. These are the things which you have hitherto learned; and they relate to the making of words: to the spelling of words in a proper manner; and to the making of the proper changes in their form, according to the change of circumstances. This is what you have learned; and this is Etymology.

247. SYNTAX is quite a different thing. It teaches the forming of scretences. In the forming of sentences you have to attend to what is called concord, and also to what is called government. Concord is only another word for agreement. The words of a sentence must agree with each other, according to the rules of grammar. They sometimes govern each other; that is to say, one word causes, or requires, another word to be in such or such a form. If I say, le chapeau blunche, my words disagree; there is not concord, because I have the feminine adjective with the masculine noun. I ought to say le chapeau blunc; and then I have concord in my sentence.

248. As to government, if I, for instance, say, il faut que j'écris une lettre, my words do not govern each other according to the laws of grammar: for, il faut requires the verb that comes after it to be in the subjunctive mode; and écris is, as you will know by this time, the Indicative mode of écrire. The Subjunctive is écrive; and, therefore, I ought to say, il faut que j'écrive une lettre. But, say you, how am I to know what words govern other words, and in what manner words are to agree? You cannot know these things until you be taught them; and Syntax is to teach you:

249. Besides, however, the concord and government, there is the placing of the words. We, for instance, say in English, a wise man; but the French say, un homme sage. We say, white paper; they say, papier blanc. Then, there is the placing of phrases, or parts of sentences; and in both languages, we must take care that we place all the parts properly; for, if we do not, our meaning will not be clear to the reader. However, you will see enough of this when you come to the Exercises, with which the rules of Syntax will be interspersed.

LETTER XVI.

THE POINTS AND MARKS USED IN WRITING.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- 250. The forms of all these Points and Marks were given you in paragraph 24. Of the accents I need say nothing here. They belong to the ETYMOLOGY, as they are component parts of words. But, the points and marks come under our present head; because they are necessary in the forming of sentences.
- 251. The Full Point, which in French is le point, and which is thus formed (.), is used at the end of every complete sentence. The Colon, which the French call deux points, and which is written thus (:), is next to the Full Point in requiring a complete sense in the words after which it is placed. The Semicolon, called, in French, un point et une virgule, and which is formed thus (;), is used to set off parts of sentences when the Comma is thought not to be quite sufficient. The Comma, la virgule, in French, is written thus (,), and is used to mark the shortest pauses in reading, and the smallest divisions in writing.
- 252. This work of pointing is, in a great degree, a matter of taste. Some persons put into one sentence what others mould into two or three sentences. It is a matter that cannot be reduced to precise rules; but, whether we write in French or in English, these points are necessary; and we ought to be attentive in using them.
 - 253. The Mark of Interrogation (?) is put at the close of words which put a question. The mark of ADMIRATION (!) is used to denote surprise. The Apos-TROPHE, or mark of Elision, is a comma placed above the line ('). The HYPHEN connects words (-).

254. As to the marks for the purpose of reference, such as *+1, and the like, they do not belong to grammar. People may make them of what form they please, and may call them what they please. But the Points and Marks in the three foregoing paragraphs belong to grammar: they assist in the forming of, and in the giving of meaning to, sentences; and for that reason it is, that they have been now, for the second time, pointed out to your attention.

LETTER XVII.

SYNTAX OF ARTICLES.

My DEAR RICHARD,

255. You will now turn back to Letter V., and read it, once more, carefully through. Then read paragraphs from 77 to 85 inclusive. These two parts of the Grammar will have taught you a great deal as to the Article. In the next Letter also, which will treat of the Syntax of Nouns, there will, in treating of Nouns, be something about the use of the Article; but, still, there is much belonging more directly to the Article itself; and this I shall say here. The thing that you now want to know is, how the manner of using the Articles in French differs from that of using them in English; and this we are now going to see.

256. There are, you know, the INDEFINITE Article, the DEFINITE Article, and what I called the COMPOUND Article; that is, the Article united with the preposition de or à.

257. Our INDEFINITE ARTICLE is a (which becomes an when followed by a vowel): the French is un, or une. In both languages this Article can be applied to nouns in the singular only. We apply it to hundred, thousand, and other words of multitude; but, this is no deviation from the rule; for, we consider the hundred, or other number, as one body, parcel, or mass. The French do not, however, use this article before cent (hundred) and mille (thousand), but say, cent pommes, and not, un cent pommes; though we must say, a hundred apples.

258. When we use this Article after such (tel or telle), and before a noun, the French give the phrase a complete turn; thus:

Such a book is a treasure, Un tel livre est un trésor.

That is to say, "a such book." We say, Mr. such a one; they say, Monsieur un tel; that is, Mr. a such. And mind, though theirs sounds shockingly to us, ours does the same to them. We use our article after so in certain phrases; thus, so good a man. The French say, in such a case, un si brave homme; that is to say, a so good man.

259. We, in speaking of nouns of weight, measure, or tale, mostly use a (or an); but the French, in such cases, use the definite Article; as:

I sell my corn at six shillings a bushel. Je vends mon blé à six schelins le boisseau.

We in English, may, in general, use the definite article in these cases. We may say, six shillings the bushel; five pence the score; and so on: but we do not use this mode of expression in general; and the French cannot do otherwise. We cannot very well do it before piece. We cannot, with any propriety, say, ducks at two shillings the piece. But this is the mode that the French must make use of. They must say, deux schelins la pièce.

260. We, in speaking of portions of time, make use of the indefinite article, where the French make use of par (by); as, ten shillings a day; which, in French, is, dix schelins par jour; that is to say, literally, ten shillings by day, which is evidently more reasonable than our mode of expression. We say, working by the day. We also say, paid by the day. Why not say, then, ten shillings by day, and not a day? The meaning of our phrase is, so much for a day; and the meaning of the French is, so much day by day.

261. We put a (or an) after the verb to be, before a noun in the singular, expressing profession, rank, state, situation, country, or any distinctive mark; as, he is a gardener; I am an Englishman. The French do not do this; they say, il est jardinier; je suis Anglais. This observation applies, however, only to cases where the business of the phrase is solely that of expressing the distinctive mark. If it have other objects, the rule does not hold; as:

He has a gardener, I see an Englishman, Il a un jardinier. Je vois un Anglais.

You see, the article is, in the former cases, left out, in the French, with very good reason; for, the words gardener and Englishman, being used solely for the purpose of designating the profession and the country of the man, the article cannot be necessary; but in the latter cases, there is something more. Here the main business is, to make it understood that he has a gardener, and that I see an Englishman.

262. We put a (or an) after what, in an exclamation; as, what a house! The French never do this: they say, quelle maison! When there is another a in English, and two nouns, as, what a fool of a lawyer, the French simply put the preposition before the last noun; as, quel sot d'avocat! When we use an adjective in sentences of this sort, we still use the article; but the French never. When our exclamation begins by what, followed by a, and goes on to use a verb before it has done, the difference in the two languages is great indeed; as:

What a good boy Richard is! Le bon garçon que Richard! What a fine country Italy is! Le beau pays que l'Italie!

These two sentences, put into English literally, would stand thus:

The good boy that Richard! The fine country that Italy!

These seem, at first sight, to be two pieces of prime nonsense; but they coutain perfectly good sense; and are much more obviously consonant with reason than the English sentences are. They are purely exclamatory: they, therefore, need neither article nor verb. They are fully as expressive in French as they are in English; and they are, beyond all comparison, more elegant.

263. It is hardly necessary for me to repeat to you, that the article must agree in gender with the noun to which it applies. Our article has no change to express gender; but this is a most important matter in French, and must be serupulously attended to. There are, as you have seen, some nouns which are masculine in one sense, and feminine in another, though spelled, in both cases, in the same way. If, for instance, I say, un ange, I mean an angel; but, if I say, une ange, I mean a fish of that name. If I say, un anne, I mean an alder tree; but if I say, une aune, I mean an alder tree; but if I say, une aune, I mean an ell. Nothing can more foreibly show the necessity of strict attention to the gender of the articles.

·264. Being now about to dismiss this indefinite article, let me again remind you, that, in French, these two words un and une, are indeterminate pronouns (see paragraph 99), and also adjectives of number, as well as articles. In short, they answer to our word one in all its capacities, except when our one answers to the French on, which is a word widely different from un or une. It is of great importance, that you bear in mind, that un and une answer to our one as well as to our a: as:

A man had one horse, one cow, and two oxen.
Un homme avait un cheval, une vache, et deux bœufs.

Thus, you see, un and une answer to our one as well as to our a.

265. Having now done with my rules about the indefinite article, I shall give you what is called an Exercise relating to that article; that is to say, I shall give you some phrases in English for you to translate into French. There must, of course, be, in these phrases, words of the other parts of speech; and these you must translate also; but I shall make the phrases so simple, so easy, that you will have little to attend to besides your articles, which are, just at present, to be the object of your eare. The first sentence is, "a hundred pounds, five shillings." You look into your Dictionary, and there you find, that hundred is cent, that pound is livre, that shilling is schelin, and that five is cinq. Your rule has just told you, that the English a is not, in this ease, expressed in French. Your translation will, therefore, be this: "cent livres, cinq schelins." If the phrase had contained a little more; thus: "He had a hundred pounds, five shillings;" here you know that He is Il, and that had is avait. Your translation must, of course, be: "Il avait cent livres, cinq schelins." You will now proceed to the performance of the first Exercise.

EXERCISE I.

- 1. A hundred pounds, five shillings.
- 2. Pens at six shillings a hundred.
- 3. Ducks at ten pence a piece.
- 4. Have you heard speak of such a thing?
- 5. If such a one come hither.
- 6. A thousand soldiers have perished.
- 7. A hundred have returned.
- 8. He is so good a father.
- 9. A garden, having a wall on one side.
- 10. It is rare to see so bad a man.
- 11. A good poet, but not a Boileau.
- 12. He is a doctor, and his brother is an attorney.
- 13. He is rich, a thing that he likes.
- 14. Such a thing has seldom happened.
- 15. Such a fault is despicable.
- 16. What a noise! What a fine flower!
- 17. What a pretty girl Emma is!
- 18. What a rich man her father is!
- 19. What charms money has!
- 20. What a horrible cry! What a fool of a boy!
- 21. Such a mistake surprises me.
- 22. A Jew's beard. One Barbary horse.
- 23. A hen with one chick. A veil and one sail.
- 24. A box of books. A book and a flower.
- 25. One gardener and a footman. A hundred knives.
- 26. An hour and a half. Half an hour.

This will be sufficient for the present. Phrases like these will frequently occur as you proceed in the future Exercises. But in order that you may, when you have finished your Exercise, know whether your translation be correct; or, in other words, whether you have well learned thus far; in order that you may know this, I shall, in Letter XXVIII., put the French of all these Exercises; and, as the French will have numbers to correspond with those of the English, you can, as soon as you have finished an Exercise, turn to my translation, when you will see whether yours be correct. If you work under the eye of a master, he will tell you at once. But, pray, have the good sense to finish your Exercise before you look at my translation! By a contrary mode of proceeding you may possibly deceive your master for a while; but, bear in mind, it is you who must be the loser by it. As I am here giving you, for the first time, instructions relative to your Exercises, let me cantion you against doing your work in a hasty and slovenly manner. Make a book to write all your exercises in; but, before you insert any translation in your book, you must make it upon a piece of paper; and, even upon that piece of paper, you ought to write it in a clean, neat, and plain manner. Do not neglect to put any of the points, marks, or accents. When you come to see much of the writing of French people, you will find that those among them who are illiterate do, as well as the English, disregard these matters in their letters and other manuscripts; but, let that be no example for you: make your writing as correct, if you can, as print itself. This will, in the long run, save you a great deal of that precious thing time. I shall so make the Exercises that they will, if you be diligent, lead you gently and easily over every difficulty.

266. Let us now come to the DEFINITE ARTICLE. We have in English only one, and it is always the. In paragraphs 77 to 85, you have seen how often the French article changes its form. We are now to see how the manner of using it differs from the manner of using ours. This article is often omitted in French in cases where it must not be omitted in English; and, still oftener is it omitted in Euglish in eases where it is indispensably necessary in French.

267. In both languages it is a general rule that proper nouns of persons do not take the article before them. See paragraph 53 on the subject of proper nouns. But, the names of countries, provinces, islands, and some other parts or divisions of the earth, take the article in French. Also the names of metals, virtues, vices, arts, sciences, grain, seed, and many other things. These do not, as we well know, take the article in English; or, at least, they seldom do. Proper nouns of cities, towns, and villages, follow, with a few exceptions, the rule relative to the proper names of persons. Take a few examples:

France is in Europe,
Normandy is in France,
Rouen is in Normandy,
The estates are in Jamaica,
Patience is very useful,
Intemperance destroys health,
Wheat is dear,
Iron is heavy.

La France est dans l'Europe.

La Normandie est dans la France.

Rouen est dans la Normandie.

Les biens sont dans la Jamaïque.

La patience est bien utile.

L'intempérance détruit la santé.

Le froment est cher.

Le fer est lourd.

There are some exceptions as to the names of those countries which take their names from those of their capital cities; as, Venice, Florence, and others. These, however, will come under your eye in the course of the Exercises, and, therefore, need not be more particularly mentioned here. The French use the article with the proper names of a few celebrated Italian poets and painters. But this is not worthy of particular notice.

268. But, you must observe well, that, when we speak of going to a country, of coming from it, or remaining in it; or, when we speak of something belonging to a country; in these cases, the article is not used in French any more than in English. For we say, "il vient de France," and not, de la France. We say, "il va en France; il demeure en France," and not, en la France. We say, "drap d'Angleterre," and not, de l'Angleterre. However, there are many exceptions to this rule: there are a great many countries and islands, and some towns and eities, the names of which always keep the articles under all circumstances. Many of these will, however, come into the Exercises; and, as to those which do not, they very seldom occur. They are of too little importance to occupy a large portion of our time here. The manner of using them is hardly reducible to rule. As to the names of mountains and rivers, we generally put the article before their names in both languages, and much in the same manner.

269. When we use proper names in the plural number, we use the article with them; as the Tudors, the Bourbons. The French do the same, whether speaking literally or figuratively.

270. Things of which there is but one of the kind, or one collection of the kind, in the ercation, as: sun, moon, earth, world, stars, take the article in both languages, except God, which takes it in neither language; and except that heaven and hell, which do not take the article in English, take it in French. If the word God be restricted in any way, we use the article in both languages; as, the God of Truth. And, thus, we may use the other article, for we may say, a God of truth. The two languages do not at all differ in this respect. These exceptions do, however, when we come to the practice, amount to very little. After a few weeks of steady application, these little difficulties all disappear.

271. We, in speaking of persons in certain situations of life, give them the appellation belonging to the situation, and put their proper names after that appellation; as, Doctor Black, Captain White. But, in French, you must use the article, and say le Docteur, and le Capitaine. We do not put Mr. before any of these names of titles, offices, posts, occupations, and situations. The French do; and you must take special care not to omit it. You must say, Monsieur le Prince, and Monsieur le Commissaire de Police. Mark this; for, to say Mr. the Prince, in English, would be shocking, and to say Mr. Prince, would be an insult.

272. In speaking of a thing in general, that is to say, in merely naming the sort of thing, we do not use the article in English; as, "bread is necessary to "man." Again, "dogs guard sheep." But in these, and all similar cases, the article is used in French; and you must say, "le pain est nécessaire à l'homme;" and "les chiens gardent les moutons."

273. When we use the singular number to express a whole kind; as, "the dog is a faithful animal;" then the article is applied by us as well as by the French; but, if we use the noun in the plural, we say dogs, and the French, les chiens. However, there is an exception to the former part of this rule; for, if we employ the singular man to express the whole kind, we do not use the article, and the French do use it. Let the two great rival poets, Pope and Bolleau, furnish us with examples.

The proper study of mankind is man, Le plus sot animal, a mon avis, c'est l'homme.

274. In the French language, as in our own, the definite article is used in some cases, and omitted in others, from, it would seem, mere habit or fashion. We say, for instance, he is in town; but we must say, he is in the country. And why must we? They say, en ville; but they say, dans la ville, and the same of the country. There are certain prepositions which require the article after them, and there are others after which you cannot correctly put the article. The examples afforded by the Exercises will, however, make all this familiar to you in a short time.

- 57. Cotton comes from Georgia.
- 58. From Florida, and from the Brazils.
- 59. The Peruvians have gold in abundance.
- 60. The Mexicans have a great deal of silver.
- 275. The compound article (as I call it) is the last that we have to treat of. I call it compound, because it is made up of an article and a preposition. Before you go any further, read, once more, paragraph 79, and also paragraph 85. You see, then, that the words du, de la, des, are, in fact, not simply articles, but a sort of compound words, answering, in many cases, to our some. In hardly any respect do the two languages differ so materially from each other as they do in this respect.
- 276. These little French words are sometimes partly articles, and sometimes they are really adjectives. When they are the former, we must render them in English by our article and preposition; when they are the latter, we must render them by some word of qualification as to quantity. In this phrase, "parlez du "cheval," the little word is article and preposition; and, therefore, we render it by our article and preposition, thus: "speak of the horse." But in this phrase, "j'ai "du foin," the same little word is an adjective; and, therefore, we render it by an adjective. Some is, in general, the word; but we may say a quantity, a parcel; or, we may use any words denoting an uncertain, unfixed, quantity; or, if it were the plural, des, any words denoting an uncertain or unfixed number. The word some, and, in interrogations the word any, and all those other words expressive of quantity or number, must be adjectives, as you must clearly perceive when you reflect on the office of the adjective. In my "Mattre d'Anglais" I had this illustration of the matter.

J'ai plusieurs amis ici, J'ai quelques amis ici, J'ai des amis ici, I have many friends here. I have some friends here. I have some friends here.

Now, plusieurs and quelques, thus used, are unquestionably adjectives, purely adjectives. And, if they are adjectives, is not this des an adjective also?

277. What we have to do, then, is to consider when it is an adjective that we have to render into French. and when it is an article along with a preposition. We have seen, that in numerous cases where we make nse of no article at all, the French use the definite article; and we shall now see that when we use some. any, or any phrase limiting the noun as to quantity or number, and yet leaving the quantity or number unfixed, we must render such word, or phrase, into French by du, de la, or des. Our some, or any, is made use of to designate an unfixed part of an undefined whole; as, "give me some sugar." Here the largeness or the smallness of the part is not fixed on: and the whole mass of sugar out of which the part is to come, is not at all defined, or pointed out. But, if you define the latter, you must use the definite article: as: "give me some of the sugar which you have bought

"to-day." Bear in mind that the French have no vords that, in this work of limiting nouns, answer to our some or any. The business of these words is performed by du, de la, and des.

278. Bear in mind that a noun must be used, first, in a general, or boundless, sense, expressing the whole of a species; as, trees grow, hares run; or, second, in a strictly confined sense, expressing particular individuals, or bodies, or masses; as, the trees which are in my garden, the hares which I have killed; or, third, in a sense which signifies limitation, but without at all fixing the limits. In the first case, the article is used in French, and not in English; in the second case, it is used in both languages; in the third case, it is not used in English, but it is used in French, united with de, and, in this its use, it answers to our some or any; though, in many cases, it is used when we omit even the some, or the any; as in this phrase, "he sells "books;" in which case the French say, "il vend des "livres."

279. However, if there be an adjective coming directly before the noun, the French do not use the article, but merely the preposition, as was said in paragraph 85. But if the adjective come after the noun, the article is used; as, ils ont du pain, ils ont de bon pain; ils ont du pain blanc. We say, in these cases, they have bread; they have good bread, they have white bread: or we may, if the case demand it, say, some bread; but we use no article and no preposition.

280. After certain words of quantity and number, as, beaucoup (much), assez (enough), peu (few), and many others, the article is not used, but merely the preposition; which is also the case when we have an adjective or passive participle following some word of number; as, quelque chose de bon; cinq poules de grasses; dix arpens de terre de labourés. However, bien, when used instead of beaucoup, must have the article before the next noun, though beaucoup has it not.

281. Many other niceties relative to the article might be pointed out, but it would be worse than useless; because practice, which there must be after all, will give you a knowledge of these niceties without turther time bestowed on rules. In the Exercise which I am about to give you here, you will find phrases containing examples relative to the indefinite and definite articles, as well as examples relating to what I have called the compound article. But you will find, as we advance, that the Exercises will embrace more and more of the parts of speech.

LETTER XVIII.

SYNTAX OF NOUNS.

My DEAR RICHARD,

282. In paragraphs from 51 to 85 you had the Etymology of Nouns. That taught you that you had to attend to the gender, the number, and the case. The Task which you had set you in Letter XIV., and in paragraphs from 174 to 180, taught you how to store your memory with regard to the gender of nouns, which, as you now well know, is the great thing of all, as far as relates to this part of speech.

283. As to the placing of nouns in sentences, there is little difference between the French and the English. The peculiarities are only two or three in number. These I will point out; and then, an Exercise, embracing a great variety of nouns, will be quite sufficient, especially after what has been said on the subject of the Article, which does, in fact, belong also to the Noun.

284. We, in English, express possession by putting an s and an apostrophe to the end of the singular noun, and if the noun be plural, an apostrophe only; as, John's book, the two brothers' book. In French this mode of expression is wholly unknown. They say, le livre de Jean, le livre des deux frères. We can say, the top of the house, or the house's top; but, in French, it is always the top of the house, le haut de la maison. There can be no mistake here, for the French rule is invariable.

285. There is a great proneness in our language to make compound words; as, gold-watch. The Freuch have none of these words: they say, montre d'or, watch of gold. The same may be said of our compound words which express the kind or occupation of the noun; as, water-rat, school-master, the kitchen-dòor. All these are rendered into French in the way just mentioned; rat d'eau, maître d'école, la porte de la cuisine.

286. These compound words of ours are sometimes translated into French by the help of à and not of de; as, drinking-glass, verre à boire. This seems reasonable, because it means, glass to drink with; but they also say, cruche à l'eau, water-jug, and poudre à canon, gunpowder. It is not easy to give a rule without numerous exceptions for the using of à and de in answer to our compounds; but this much may be said, that when the first part of our compound expresses an action which is performed by the use of the thing expressed by the latter word of the compound, the French make use of à and not of de; as, writing-paper, papier à écrire; dining-room, salle à manger. In other cases they make use of de.

287. In translating the following Exercise, pay particular attention to the genders, and to the forming of the plural numbers. Have your little book of the genders of nouns before you. The rules for forming the plural numbers which you have in paragraph 68, you must look at again. Bear in mind that the articles and adjectives must agree in gender and number with the nouns to which they apply. Bear in mind that there are many nouns which are feminine in one sense, and masculine in another. Before you translate a phrase, consider well the meaning of the English noun; and then think of the gender of the French noun by which you are going to translate the English noun.

LETTER XIX.

SYNTAX OF PRONOUNS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

288. Now read over very earofully the paragraphs from 87 to 100 inclusive. Do not think that this is not necessary. It is necessary, and therefore do it. You will not understand what I am now about to write half so well, unless you first read over again the part that I have just pointed out.

289. Having read those paragraphs, you will have again seen, that there are FIVE CLASSES of Pronouns; that is to say, the Personal; the Possessive; the Relative; the Demonstrative; and the Indeterminate. In the paragraphs just mentioned I treated of the etymology of these; I am now going to treat of their Syntax; that is, to give rules for using them in sentences; and, as this is a very important part of speech, you ought here to be uncommonly attentive.

290. First Class, or PERSONAL PRONOUNS.—After all the repetitions in the Conjugations of the Verbs, it would be waste of time to dwell upon definitions of the personal pronouns. You must know what they are as well as I do. But that which you cannot yet know so well is, how they are used in sentences. Look now at paragraph 91. Read it very carefully. I there tell you that the Syntax will teach you something; and I am now about to make good my word.

291. These cases are things of great importance with regard to pronouns, and especially with regard to French pronouns. The French personal pronouns are, in many instances, placed in the sentences very differently from ours; and, in some instances, one word in French makes two words in English. Hence the matter demands a great deal of attention; but that attention will soon do the business.

292. The verb must now be brought into great use in the Exercises; because, without the verb, the use of the pronoun cannot be explained. For instance, I have to tell you that, in this phrase, I see you, though the second pronoun comes after the verb in English, it must come before the verb in French; as, je vous vois. Thus, you see, we could not get on at all here without knowing a great deal about the verbs.

293. The use of the personal pronouns in their nominative cases is plain enough: je, tu, il, elle, nous, vous, ils, elles, answer to our I, thou, he, she, it, we, you, they. But nous is both we and us; and, then, there is the manner of placing nous, vous, lui, and others of them, in the sentence, which is very different from our manner of placing them.

294. Look at the tables in paragraph 91. There you have all the personal pronouns, first in their singular and then in their plural number. You have them exhibited in their number, person, gender, and case, and in both languages. Let us now take them, then, one by one, and compare the manner of using them in French with the manner of using them in English.

295. The first person singular is I—JE. Our I is always a capital letter; but the French je is written like another word. Our I is sometimes separated from the verb, and placed after a conjunction, leaving another verb to be understood; as, you are richer than I. But the French je is never thus used: you must never say, vous êtes plus riche que je. The place of the French pronoun ie is before the verb only; and it is never, as our I is, separated from the verb, nor placed after a conjunction, as in the above case. In interrogations the je may come after the verb; but you will see enough of that by-and-by. In the possessive ease our I becomes of me, and in the objective, me. In the French, the je becomes, in some cases, moi in the nominative, de moi in the possessive, and me, or moi, in the objective. We say, of me, but the French must say, de moi, and never de me, or à me; though. observe, their me, in other cases, answers to our me. This same moi is sometimes answered by our I. If there were only the je and the me in French to answer our I and me, we should do very well with them: but there comes in this moi to puzzle us; and it is to this. therefore, that we have to pay strict attention. I have just said, that the place of je is before the verb; as:

Je frappe souvent, Je bois du vin, I strike often. I drink wine.

When our I is placed after the verb, or after a conjunction, leaving a verb to be understood, it is not answered by je, but by moi; as:

It is I who act, He knows it better than I, He writes as well as I, She is wiser than I, C'est moi qui agis. Il le sait mieux que moi. Il écrit aussi bien que moi. Elle est plus sage que moi.

In these instances we see moi answering to our I. Let us now see it answering to our me; which it always does when there is a preposition coming before the French pronoun, or when the verb in French comes before the pronoun. I beg you to pay attention to this; and to observe well the following examples:

He comes to me, Give me some paper, They speak of me, It is for me, Il vient à moi. Donnez-moi du papier. Ils parlent de moi. C'est pour moi.

And not, il vient à me, and so on. But when there is no preposition eoming before the pronoun, and when the verb does not eome before it, the English me is rendered in French by me: as:

He strikes me, You give me some paper, They speak to me, It is agreeable to me, James has stricken me, Il me frappe.
Vous me donnez du papier.
Ils me parlent.
Il m'est agréable.
Jacques m'a frappé.

You see that we have no word in English that answers to this moi. We have, for the first persen singular, only the I and the me, both of which, as we have just seen, are, sometimes, answered by moi; to know when this is, I have, I hope, now taught you.

296. Before I proceed to the second person, let me tell you that I shall reserve the rules for placing the personal pronouns, till I have, in the above way, gone through the three persons plural, as well as singular.

297. The second person singular is THOU—TU. The pronouns of this person singular, are, as you have seen in paragraph 93, very rarely used. We use, in both languages, the plural pronoun instead of the singular: we say you, and not thou; and vous, and not tu. However, we must notice them in the same way as we should if they were in common use. Thou is answered by tu; and thee, which is our other case of this pronoun, is sometimes answered by te, and sometimes by toi. Look at the table in paragraph 91.

Observe, that what is said of moi, or rather, of the occasions when it is used to answer to our I and me, applies to toi supplying the place of tu and te. Toi is used, as is the case with moi, when there is a preposition or a verb before the pronoun; or when there is a conjunction before our thou, leaving a verb to be understood. I will take, as nearly as possible, the same examples that I took to explain the use of the pronouns of the first person singular:

Here, as was observed in the parallel case in the first person, there is no verb and no preposition coming before the French pronoun, and no conjunction before ours. Therefore the toi is not used. But, now, attend to the following examples:

It is thou who actest,
He knows it better than thou,
He writes as well as thou,
She is wiser than thou,
He comes to thee,
They speak of thee,
It is for thee,
He strikes thee,
I give thee some paper,
They speak to thee,
I tis agreeable to thee,
James has stricken thee,

C'est toi qui agis.

Il le sait mieux que toi.

Il écrit aussi bien que toi.

Elle est plus sage que toi.

Il vient à toi.

Ils parlent de toi.

C'est pour toi.

Il te frappe.

Je te donne du papier.

Ils te parlent.

Il t'est agréable.

Jaques t'a frappé.

Thus, you see, as I and me are on certain occasions answered by moi, so thou and thee are answered by toi.

298. The third person singular is IIE—IL. Gender comes in here; but we will lay the two other genders aside for the present, and speak only of the masculine. The il answers to our he; as:

Il frappe souvent, Il boit du vin,

He drinks wine.

But, here eomes the French lui, to answer, in this case, the purpose which moi and toi answer in the instances above given. Look at the table in paragraph 91. You find that he is il; that of him is de lui; and that him is sometimes lui and sometimes le. The rule that I gave before applies here. When the French pronoun has a verb or a preposition before it, or when the English pronoun has a conjunction before it, with a verb understood to follow; in these cases the lui is used in Freuel instead of il and le. I shall now take the very same examples that I have just taken to explain my meaning with regard to the first and the second person singular; and when you have well attended to them, and compared the manner of using lui with that of using moi and toi, you will, I think, elearly understand the whole of this matter.

It is he who acts, She knows it better than he, You write as well as he, She is wiser than he,

We come to him, They speak of him, It is for him,

They strike him, James has stricken him, C'est lui qui agit. Elle le sait mieux que lui. Vous écrivez aussi bien que lui. Elle est plus sage que lui.

Nous venons à lui. Ils parlent de lui. C'est pour lui.

Ils le frappent. Jacques l a frappé.

Now mind; the three last examples all but one, in paragraph 295, and also in 297, are here omitted; because, in the third person you cannot use the le instead of the lui, if there be a preposition before the English pronoun, expressed or understood. Therefore you must translate those three examples as follows:

I give him some paper, They speak to him, It is agreeable to him, Je lui donne du papier. 11s lui parlent. 11 lui est agréable. Compare these with the three last examples but one in paragraph 297, and you will see the difference in a moment. But now, before we quit the Singular Number, we must speak of the Genders. The feminine gender is, SHE—ELLE. Then, our she becomes, in the other cases, her, while the French elle becomes, in the objective, la, and sometimes lui, and sometimes elle; besides. This appears to be very confused; but the confusion is worn away by attention. She is answered by elle, and her is answered by la, just in the same manner that he and him, in the masculine, are answered by il and le.

She strikes often, She drinks wine, They strike her,

Elle frappe souvent.
Elle boit du vin.
Ils la frappent.

But, observe (look at the table in paragraph 91), there is in the objective case elle as well as lui. This is the use of that elle: it is to be used when there is a preposition before the pronoun; and when there is not, lui is to be used, for example, speaking of a woman, we say:

C'est à elle que je parle, Et je lui parlerai encore,

It is to her that I speak. And I will speak to her still.

The only difference is this, that, if it had been a masculine, I must have had à lui in the first line. Now, as to the neuter gender, there is none in the French. They know nothing at all of it. Our it, therefore, as a personal pronoun, has nothing to answer it in French, except masculine and feminine pronouns. So that what we have to do is this: consider what is the gender of the French noun which answers to the English noun which our it represents; as, put my knije in your pocket; but take care, for it is pointed, and as to your pocket, it is not very good. Here are two froms and two its. The first noun is masculine, the second feminine. The French pronouns must, therefore, correspond with them; as, mettez mon couteau dans votre poche; mais prenez garde, car il est pointu; et, quant à votre poche, elle n'est pas très bonne. The lui, the à elle, and, in short, all the parts of the il or elle, when they answer to our it, are used precisely in the same way as when they answer to our he or she.

299. Plural Number. I now come to the plurals of the same pronouns that I have just been treating of in the singular. Look at the table in the latter part of paragraph 91. Examine that table well, compare it with the table of singulars in the same paragraph; and then come on with me.

300. The first person plural is WE—NOUS. Our we becomes, in the other cases (see the table), us; but the French pronoun of this person and number never changes its form; and nous answers to our us as well as to our we. A few of the examples that we took for the singular number will suffice.

We drink wine,
It is we who act,
He knows it better than we,
She is wiser than we,
He comes to us,
Give us some paper,
James strikes us,

Nous buvons du vin.
C'est nous qui agissons.
Il le sait mieux que nous.
Elle est plus sage que nous.
Il vient à nous.
Donnez-nous du papier.
Jacques nous frappe.

This is very plain. Our we and our us are always expressed in French by nous, which takes the pronoun before it, or the verb, just in the same manuer that moi does.

301. The second person plural, is, YOU—VOUS. We have just seen that nous is both nominative and objective; that, in short, it answers for all cases. The same is to be said of vous; and, here, our pronoun is unchangeable too; for you is the same in the objective that it is in the nominative; for I say, you strike me, and I strike you. A few examples will be sufficient; nearly the same that we took last.

You drink wine,
It is you who act,
Ile knows it better than you,
She is wiser than you,
He comes to you,
James strikes you,
They talk to you,
You cut bread,

Vous buvez du vin.
C'est vous qui agissez,
Il le sait mieux que vous.
Elle est plus sage que vous.
Il vient à vous.
Jacques vous frappe.
Ils vous parient.
Vous coupez du pain.

As in the case of mous, this pronoun vous takes the preposition before it, and also the verb, like moi or toi; but it does not, like the pronoun of the second person singular, change its form; it always remains vous.

302.The third person plural is, THEY-ILS. Here the gender comes in again; but, in English, there is no change in the third person plural of the pronouns to denote gender. We always say they, whether we speak of men, women, or trees. But the French change the form of the pronoun, in this person, to express gender. Let us first take the masculine its, which answers to our they; as, ils boivent, they drink. Our they becomes, in the other eases, them, and this them is rendered in French by les, eux, or leur, Besides this, our they is sometimes rendered by eux. The thing to know, then, is, when our they is to be ils, and when cux, and when our them is to be les, when leur, and when eux. As to the first, our they is to be ils when, in French, there is no preposition and no verb before the pronoun, and when our they has no conjunction before it in the English, with a verb understood to follow. It is the same as in the case of il and lui, and will be explained by the same examples.

They strike often, They drink wine, It is they who act, She is wiser than the Ils frappent souvent.
Ils boivent du vin.
C'est eux qui agissent.
Elle est plus sage qu'eux.

Now, as to our them. It is to be les when it is the object of an action; it is to be eux when a preposition is used before it; it is to be leur when the verb, used with it, leaves $\hat{\alpha}$ (to) to be understood; as:

James striles them, She talks of them, I give them some paper, Jacques les frappe. Elle parle d'eux. Je leur donne du papier.

But I must now mention what I until now omitted, to avoid confusion. By looking at the table last mentioned, you see, in the nominative case, ils or eux, to answer to our they, in the masculine. Now this eux, used thus, appears very strange. But it may be used thus, and so may lui. The feminine differs only from the masculine in this; that, in the nominative, our they is answered by elles instead of ils, and, in all the cases where eux is made use of in the masculine, elles is made use of in the feminine; and here are the examples to show it.

They strike often,
They drink wine,
It is they who act,
He is wiser than they,
Larges strikes them

James strikes them, She talks of them, I gave them some paper. Elles frappent souvent.
Elles boivent du vin.
C'est elles qui agissent.
Il est plus sage qu'elles.

Jacques les frappe.
Elle parle d'elles

' Je leur donne du papier.

After what has just been said, at the close of paragraph 298, it would be useless to make any further remarks on our neuter gender. They and them, when they relate to neutral nouns, are to be dealt with in the same manner as directed for our it.

303. There now remains, with regard to these personal pronouns, the instructions as to the manner of placing them in the sentence, which is very different from our manner; but which is, with a little attention. very soon learned. The ie. nous. tu, vous, il, elle, ils, elles, take the lead in the sentence, when they are the actors, in the same way that our I, we, thou, you, he, she, and they do; as, je bois du vin, nous frappons à la porte: I drink wine, we knock at the door. But we, in English, very frequently put other words between the pronour and verb; as, I very often drink wine, we every day knock at the door. This must not be in The nominative case of the pronoun must not be separated from the erb. You must not say, je très souvent bois du vin; but must place the words thus:

I very often drink wine, We every day knock at the door. | Je bois du vin très-souvent. Nous frappons à la porte tous les jours.

304. When there is a pronoun that is the object of the action, it comes before the verb, and not after it, as in English. We say, James strikes me; but, in French, you must say, Jacques me frappe; that is to say, James me strikes. When the verb is in the imperative mode, indeed, the pronoun comes last; as, frappez-le. But the cause of this is obvious. The general turn of the French language brings the pronoun, when it is the object, immediately before the verb; as, je le pense, il le dit, nous le jurons; I think it, he says it, we swear it; or, word for word: I it think, he it says, we it swear.

305. These are the principal things to attend to in the personal pronouns. I shall now give you an Exercise on the subject. There are other things to notice by-and-by, connected with these pronouns, and especially the manner of placing them in negative and interrogative sentences: but, for the present, we have enough of them; and will proceed to our Exercise, which will contain an instance or two of nearly all the kinds of phrases that are necessary to our present purpose. The phrases are placed promiseuously; that is to say, not in the order of the rules which they are intended to illustrate.

- 28. We eat meat, and drink water.
- 29. They often come to us to get wine.
- 30. I gave him gold for you.
- 31. You saw them go to her.
- 306. Second Class: POSSESSIVE PRONOUNS.—See them in their table in paragraph 94. In these there are no cases to attend to. There are only the Number, the Person, and the Gender. Read paragraph 94 all through; and you will need nothing here but a brief Exercise.
- 307. But, in paragraph 95 there is another table of possessive pronouns. Those also are so fully spoken of in that paragraph, that little more than the exercise is required here. The main thing in both these is, to attend to the agreement in number and gender. This agreement must be perfect. Read with great eare the two paragraphs just mentioned.
- 308. There is one remark to make, and this you must particularly attend to. We, in speaking of harm done to, or pain suffered in, our members, or bodies, make use of the possessive pronoun; as, my head aches, my finger smarts. The French, in these cases, use the article, thus: j'ai mal à la tête; j'ai mal au doigt. He hurts my arm; il me fait mal au bras. The pronoun may sometimes be used; but this that I have been describing here is the French idiom.

309. Observe that here, as in the case of the articles, when the noun begins with a vowel or an h mute, the singular masculine pronoun is put before it, be it of whichever gender it may; as, mon ami, mon amie, though one be masculine and the other feminine. The same is to be observed with regard to ton and son.

 - 26. His hand, her arm, our fingers, their legs, my feet.
 - 27. Her gown, her cap, her head, her neek, her teeth.
 - 28. Put your hay to mine: take yours from mine.
 - 29. He does not talk of your beauty, but of mine.
 - 30. They do not talk of hers, but of ours.
- 310. Third Class: RELATIVE PRONOUNS.—Look at the table in paragraph 96. You see that there are but few of these; but they require attention. Our who is answered by qui, except when a question is asked, and then it may be by quel or quelle followed by the noun or by a pronoun; as, quels sont ees hommesla? Who are those men? But in all other cases our who is answered by qui; as:

l'homme qui vient de sortir, | the man who is just gone out.

311. As our that may be, in some cases, used instead of who; as it may, indeed, in the instance just given; so it is, in these cases, translated by qui. That, however, can be rendered by qui only when the person or thing to which it relates is not the object of a verb coming after the relative. Take examples:

l'homme qui vient de partir, le cheval qui mange l'herbe, le foin qui est pour le cheval, the man that (or who) is just gone away.

the horse that eats the grass.

the hay that is for the horse.

But when there is such a verb in the sentence, the relative pronoun in French, to express our that or our whom, must be que. As:

I'homme que j'ai vu partir,

the man that (or whom) I have seen go away.

le cheval que vous montez, the horse that you ride.
le foin que nous donnons aux the hay that we give to horses.
chevaux,

And here you will observe, also, in the first three of these examples with qui, that though we cannot with propriety use who as the relative to the names of things inanimate or irrational, the French use qui with such names, if its antecedents be in the nominative.—Que is abbreviated before a vowel, but qui never is. Remark this: le cheval qui a vu mon domestique; that is, the horse which has seen my servant, but, le cheval qu'a vu mon domestique, means, the horse which my servant has seen.

- 312. Our whose is answered by de qui, or dont: but de qui is confined to rational animals, like our whose and whom. Dont is used for all sorts of objects, except when a question is asked; and then it must be de qui, or duquel, or de laquelle, according to the number and gender of the antecedent.
- 313. Our whom, as already shown in paragraph 311, is answered by que; as, l'homme que vous voyez; tho man whom you see. But if there be a preposition, our whom is rendered by qui or lequel; as, tho man to whom I have sent; l'homme à qui or auquel, j'ai envoyé.
- 314. Our which is answered by qui, as our that is, as we have seen in paragraph 311. And here again the same rule as that given in paragraph 311 is to be followed; that is, when to translate which by qui, and when by que. Our which would apply in all the four examples, the horse, the hay, while the French qui applies to the first couple, and the que to the second couple of those examples, just as in translating our that. So in the following:

le bouf qui laboure la terre, ithe ox which ploughs the land. le bouf que je vous ai vendu, the ox which I have sold you.

Our which is sometimes answered by lequel; and this pronoun takes the article with it, as you see in paragraph 97. Indeed, here is the le in this word, which means the which, being used as a relative to a singular masculine. If it were a feminine, it must have been laquelle; if a plural masculine, lesquels; and so on. And, as with whom, mentioned in paragraph 313, so with which when there is a preposition. As:

C'est le cheval Juquel, OR dont, il vous a parlé,
La mort est un mal auquel il n'y a point de remède,

It is the horso of which ho has spoken to you.

Death is an evil for which there is no remedy.

Observe, that the French word où, which means where, is frequently used, and very frequently too, to supply the place of dans lequel (in which), dans laquelle, and so on; as, l'état où je suis; the state in which (where) I am.

315. Our what is answered by quoi, que, or quel. But the former is not used (as a relative) in speaking of persons, and is most frequently used with a preposition; as, de quoi, à quoi; which means of what, to what. But our what is also frequently answered by que; as, que voulez-vous? What would you have? Que dites-vous? What do you say? Our what is answered by quel, when questions are asked with a noun; as, What house is that? Quelle maison est celle-là?

316. You must take care, in using relative pronouns, to keep their ANTECEDENTS constantly in your eye. In my English Grammar (paragraph 245), I have contended, that the relative pronouns never can be the nominatives of Verbs. I will quote the passage: for it serves most admirably to illustrate what I am about to say with respect to the functions of the French relative pronouns: - "In looking for the nominative of a " sentence, take care that the relative pronoun be not "a stumbling-block; for relatives have no changes to "denote number or person; and, though they may " sometimes appear to be, of themselves, nominatives, "they never can be such. The men wife are here: " the man WHO IS here: the cocks THAT crow: the cock "THAT crows. Now, if the relative be the nominative, "why do the verbs change, seeing that here is no "change in the relative? No; the verb, in pursuit of " its nominative, runs through the relatives to come at "their antecedents, men, man, cocks, cock. BISHOP " Lowth says, however, that 'the relative is the nomi-" 'native when no other nominative comes between it and " 'the verb :' and Mr. MURRAY has very faithfully copied "this erroneous observation. Who is in the house? "Who are in the house? Who strikes the iron? Who "was in the street? Who were in the street? "here is, in all these instances, no other nominative " between the relative and the verb, and yet the verb "is continually varying. Why does it vary? Because "it disregards the relative, and goes and finds the "antecedent, and accommodates its number to that "antecedent. The antecedents are, in these instances, "understood: What person is in the house? What " persons are in the house? What person strikes the "iron? What persons strike the iron? What person " was in the street? What persons were in the street? "The Bishop seems to have had a misgiving in his " mind when he gave this account of the nominative "functions of the relative; for he adds, 'the relative is " of the same number and person as the antecedent; " ' and the verb AGREES WITH IT accordingly.' Oh, oh! "But the relative is always the same, and is of any "and of every number and person. How, then, can "the verb, when it makes its changes in number and " person, be said to agree with the relative? Disagree, " indeed, with the relative the verb cannot, any more "than it can with a preposition, for the relative has, "like the preposition, no changes to denote cases; but, "the danger is, that, in certain instances, the relative "may be taken for a nominative, without your looking "after the antecedent, which is the real nominative, " and that, thus, not having the number and person of "the antecedent clearly in your mind, you may give "to the verb a wrong number or person." Now, then, let us see how this matter is in French. Monsieur RESTAUT, in his rules respecting the relative pronoun, tells us, that the verbs and adjectives are to be sometimes in the plural, and sometimes in the singular, after qui (who), and that the adjective, or participle, is affected in the same way. He has these two examples:

Hégésisochus fut un de ceux qui travailla le plus efficacement à la ruine de sa patrie.

What! Here is the phrase, fut un de ceux qui (was one of those who) in both cases; and yet, in one ease, the verb (furent) is in the plural; and, in the other case, the verb (travailla) is in the singular. How, then, can the qui be the nominative of these verbs? It is clearly the nominative in neither instance. Well, but what are the antecedents? Is the pronoun ceux the antecedent in the first case? It must be so; and thus we should have it in English:

Cicero was one of THOSE, who were sacrifiedd to the vengeance of the Triumvirs.

But, then, where is the antecedent in the second instance? Monsieur Restaut says, that un is the antecedent here. Why? For what? There is no reason at all. Monsieur Restaut says that qui is sometimes in the plural and sometimes in the singular. Strange remark! and that, too, from a very elever man. But let us have another instance. Monsieur Restaut gives his scholar this sentence: "Ctésias est "UN des premiers QUI AIT exécuté cette entreprise." Now, mark his reasons, which I shall give in English. "The verb is here put in the singular, because its "nominative, qui, is a relative pronoun in the singular, "and has for antecedent the word un. When we say,

[&]quot; CTÉSIAS est un des premiers qui AIT exécuté cotte entreprise, [&]quot;we mean not only that nobody had executed it before "him, but, moreover, that he executed it before all "others, and that he set them the example. But when,

[&]quot; on the contrary, we say,

[&]quot; CTÉSIAS est un des premiers qui AIENT exécuté cette entreprise, [&]quot;we mean, that several persons executed the enterprise at the outset, and that CTÉSIAS was one of them."——Very good, Monsieur Restaut. But then, pray, why do you call the qui the nominative of the verb? You prove as clearly as day-light that UN is the nominative in the first example, and that DES PREMIERS is the nominative in the second; you make the verbs agree with these nominatives in number, and yet you persist in ealling the qui the nominative! And, in order to give a show of reason for this, you say, that qui is in the singular in the first example, and in the plural in the second, though it never changes its form. Therefore, mind, my dear son, the thing for us to attend to here is this: that we are never to look upon qui as the nominative of the verb. We must look for the antecedent; and, according to that, make the number and operson of our verb. Les soldats qui marchent, and le soldat qui marche; but, if we were to look upon qui as the nominative, why should it be marchent in one ease, and marche in the other? principle applies to both languages; but the truth of it is most clearly seen in the French, because in it the verb makes such conspicuous changes in its form to agree in number with its nominative case.

[Note.—The examples here above given are applicable also to the part of Syntax which relates to the Number of the Verb. See Note at the end of paragraph 385, where reference is made back to this place.]

- 38. One of the first who did it.
- 39. The hawk that my brother has shot.
- 40. Who can tell what may happen?
- 317. Fourth Class: DEMONSTRATIVE PRO-NOUNS.-Look now at paragraph 98. Attend to the whole of it, and particularly to the table. You see here a great variety of words to answer to our this, that, these, and those. You see he and she in the table. That is because the French make use of these pronouns sometimes to supply the place of these two personal pronouns. In fact, the celui is the lui (he or him) with the ce (this) prefixed to it; and the celle is the elle (she or her) with the ce (dropping the e) prefixed to The same may be said of ceux, which is eux (they or them) with the ce (dropping the e) prefixed to it. So that, if we were to put these words into English literally, CELUI would be this he; CELLE would be this she; CEUX would be this they masculine; and CELLES would be this they feminine. The CECI and CELA are this here and this there. CELUI-CI is this he here; and CELUI-LA, is this he there. The same explanation holds good as to CELLE-CI, CELLE-LA, CEUX-CI, and CEUX-LA, CELLES-CI, and CELLES-LA. Ci and là are adverbs. meaning here and there.

318. The original word is, as we have seen, CE (this); which is CET before a vowel, CETTE for the feminine, and CES for the plural of both genders. This is all that there is of the word itself; all the rest is personal pronoun and adverb. The ce is greatly used with the verb to be, être, instead of the personal pronoun il; as, c'est une bonne chose, que de se lever de bonne heure: IT is a good thing to rise early. It is a softer expression than il est, and it is a great favourite with the French.

319. These pronouns are, or, rather, this pronoun is, called Demonstrative, because it is used to point out the noun in a direct manner; almost to show it; as, this house, that field, these oxen, those fowls. When we use these words, we seem to be almost pointing with our finger at the house, the field, the oxen, and the fowls. To demonstrate means to show in the clearest manner; and, therefore, these are called Demonstrative pronouns; or, rather, this is called a demonstrative pronoun; for, as I have shown, there is, in fact, only the pronoun ce, all the rest being the same word under different forms. Nor have we but one word of this kind; namely, this. The other three demonstratives are only so many changes in the form of this. The first change is that, the next is these, and the third those. These changes are to express situation and number. The French, in addition to situation and number, express gender, which, in this case, we do not. We say, this boy, this girl, this hat, this pen; but they say, ce garçon, cette fille, ce chapeau, cette plume. the plural they have ces for both genders; but this answers to our these and those only in part; only when there is a noun coming directly after it; as, ces garçons, ces filles; and then there must generally be ci, or là, after the noun; as, ees garcons-ci, these boys; ces filles-là, those girls.

320. Our those is frequently used indifferently with the personal pronoun they; but when this can be done in English, the French requires the demonstrative; as:

They who are wise,
These who are wise,

In the singular number, we cannot, in English, use the demonstrative in this way. We cannot say, speaking of a man:

This who is very tall.
That who is very rich.

We must use the personal pronoun, thus:

He who is very tall. He who is very rich.

Then, in speaking of a woman, we must say,

She who is very tall. She who is very rich.

But, in French, the demonstrative is used in all these cases; celui in the first four instances, and celle in the two last.

321. But, the main thing in regard to these demonstratives, the great difference in the two languages, and great object for you to attend to, is, the use of CE with the verb être; in which use it generally answers to our it, but sometimes to our he or she. The use of ce, in this way, is of endless occurrence. We say,

It is a good thing.
He is a good man.
She is a very handsome girl.

In all these cases the French say, c'est une bonne chose, c'est un brave homme, and so on. The ce means this, but no matter: the French language chooses to say, this is a good thing, and not, it is a good thing. But mind, in certain cases you have no choice: for, when we, in English, use it with the verb to be followed by a noun or a pronoun, thus, it is I who see the enemy; when we, in English, have a phrase of this sort, we must, in French, employ ce, and not it. We cannot say, il est moi qui vois l'ennemi. We must say, c'est moi. In all such phrases, it was I, it is you, it was we, it was the people, and the like, you must use ce for our it: as, c'était moi, c'est vous, and so on, always with ce, and not with il. How the verb is to be managed in these cases you will see when you come to the impersonal verbs. At present we have to do with the pronouns; and particularly with the use of ce for our it. Having now, I think, pretty well explained the nature and offices of these pronouns, I shall give you an Exercise on them.

EXERCISE VIII.

- 30. These woodcocks fly swifter than those.
- 31. Which of them are best to eat? .
- 32. Those that fly swiftly, or those that fly slowly?
- 322. Fifth Class: INDETERMINATE PRO-NOUNS.—Now go back to paragraph 99. Read that paragraph, and also paragraph 100, very attentively; and examine well the list of indeterminate pronouns in paragraph 99. First of all, after you have looked well at this list, observe this; that, though there are ecrtain English words placed opposite the French words, and though, in some cases, the latter answer to the former, they do not always do it. It is not this table alone, therefore, that will teach you how to use these French words, and especially the five last, which, though called indeterminate words, are really amongst the most important in the language. When the scholar sees of it, of him, of her, of them, and nothing but the French en placed opposite them: when he sees that this one little word is to answer to all these different phrases, the difficulty seems insurmountable. At the end, however, of a few days' attentive study, the difficulty disappears; and, before the end of an hour, you will, I trust, perceive it begin to disappear.

- 323. ALL—TOUT, which, as you see, becomes tous, toute, and toutes. This word answers, in this sense, to our ALL. This all, you will bear in mind, is not a pronoun in all cases. It is not one in this very phrase, "all cases." It is an adjective. It is a pronoun only when it stands for a noun: and, it is quite clear to me, that it ought never to be called a pronoun, seeing that I know of no case where a noun is not understood when all is used.
- 324. Both—L'un et l'autre. The French have no single word to answer to our both. They are obliged to say, the one and the other; and this phrase changes, you see, according to number and gender. There can, however, be no difficulty here; and the same may be said of either, neither, and one another. The first is l'un ou l'autre (the one or the other); the next, ni l'un ni l'autre (neither the one nor the other); and the last is, l'un l'autre (the one the other); which last phrase is, you will find, if you look well into it, just as consonant with reason as our one another. It is now, I hope, unnecessary for me to dwell on the changes to be made here on account of number and gender. These must, by this time, have become as familiar to you as the use of your eyes or teeth.
- 325. Somebody, or some one—quelqu'un. Everybody, each, every one—chacun. These apply to things as well as persons in French; though where body is used they do not so apply in English. Chacun has gender, you see; but no change to denote a difference in number. However, these things are so little embarrassing, that a very few instances in the Exercises will be sufficient to make them clear to you.

326. Nobody, None—Aucun, Nul, Nulle. In the French all these three pronouns apply to things as well as to persons. They admit of no changes except those you see in the table.

327. Anybody—quiconque, is of both genders, and never used but in the singular number. Whoever is also translated by quiconque, as well as by qui que ce soit. Whatever is translated by quoi que ce soit, quoi que, quelconque, quel que, and quelque.

[Note.—Quel que is written in two words when followed by a verb, and is then a kind of adjective, which must agree in gender and number with the noun to which it refers; as, quel que soit son age; quels que soient ses desseins.—Quelque, before a noun, whether accompanied by an adjective or not, takes an s for the plural; as, quelques bonnes plumes que vous ayez. Quelque, in the sense of however, never changes its form.]

328. Nobody—personne. This is a word much in use. It is written like the feminine noun personne (person); but it is a negative pronoun, meaning nobody, or no one; and it is wholly unchangeable in its form. Plusieurs (many) and Rien (nothing), the first being always plural and the last always singular, merit no particular remark. They experience no changes in their form, and have, in all cases, the same meaning.

329. Very different is it with the remaining five pronouns, which, as before observed, are amongst the most important words in the French language. I shall devote one paragraph to each of them, and, in order to obviate confusion and to make reference easy, no more than one paragraph.

330. Le. This is, you know, the definite article, the; it is also the personal pronoun, him; it is the personal pronoun it; as:

Le pommier porte beaucoup de fruit,
Je le taille tous les ans,
C'est mon domestique: je le maintiens.

The apple-tree bears a good deal of fruit.

I prune it every year.

He is my servant: I support

Thus, then, we have this same LE acting in three capacities. But we are now to view it in its fourth capacity, in which we shall, agreeably to the table in paragraph 99, find it sometimes answering to so, or such, sometimes to it, and sometimes supplying the place of great part of a sentence. Let us take an instance of each:

Vous êtes laborieux, et il ne l'est pas. Je crois qu'il va venir; du moins je le désire. Étes-vous le propriétaire de cette maison? Oui, je le suis.

In the first of these instances, we should put so; in the second it; in the third nothing, or we should nearly repeat all the words of the question, and say, yes, I am the proprietor of it. So that this little word performs a great deal. It makes the sense precise and clear without repetition and a great mass of words. Perhaps, however, if we look well into the matter, we might, without any very great violence done to our language, translate this le by our it. Let us take the three examples just given:

You are industrious, and he is not it.

I believe that he is coming; at least I wish it.

Are you the proprietor of that house? Yes, I am it.

We have now done with this LE, till we come to the interrogatives and negatives, where we shall find it a great actor.

331. En. This word, the table says, answers to our of it, of him, of her, of them. But it answers, perhaps, to a great deal more than all these. It is a word of most extensive usc. It is always in the objective case, and it never changes its form. Its use is to save repetition. This is, indeed, the office of all pronouns; but en applies in so many ways, that it would fill a volunic to describe minutely all its functions. You must bear in mind, that EN is sometimes a preposition; and that, then, it means in. However, that is wholly a different word, though containing the same letters. En, pronoun, may have relation to, or may stand for, a noun of either gender, or either number. always preceded by some noun, expressed or understood; and it is made use of to save the repeating of that noun, or the employing of many words, which are rendered unnecessary by employing it. A few examples will give you an idea of its use:

- 1. Savez-vous où il y a des choux? Oui; il y en a dans mon jardin.
- 2. Avez-vous parlé de la fille? Oui; j'en ai parlé.
- 3. Voulez-yous des noix? Oui; j'en veux.
- 4. Tenez-vous des chiens? J'en tiens plusieurs.
- 5. Combien de moutons avez-vous? J'en ai trois cents.
- 6. Il a vendu du sucre; mais il en a encore.7. Ils avaient des fleurs, et ils en ont encore de très-belles.
- 8. Voici de belles pêches: en voulez-vous?

Now let us make, as nearly as possible, a word-forword translation of these sentences:

- 1. Know you where there are cabbages? Yes; there are of them in my garden.
- 2. Have you spoken of the girl? Yes; I of her have spoken.
- 3. Wish you to have some walnuts? Yes; I of them wish to have.

4 Keep you dogs? I of them keep several.

5. How many sheep have you? I of them have three hundred.

6. He has sold some sugar; but he of it has yet.

7. They had flowers, and they of them have yet very fine.
8. See, here are fine peaches: of them do you wish to have?

You see, then, what an important word this is: and yet, till you come to interrogatives and negatives, you see but a part of its importance. Besides its applicability to all persons and things, it applies to place, and stands for, from this, from that, or from this place, or that place; as:

Il en viente Je m'en vais, Allez-vous-en, He comes, or is come, from that place. I am going away.
Go hence; or, go away.

In all these eases the en is a pronoun, though translated by a noun or an adverb. If the translation were strictly literal, it would stand thus: he from it comes; I from it go; go you from it; or, at least, from that and from this (place). Always look well into these literal meanings; for, by doing that, you get at the reason for the thing being thus, or thus; and, mind, it is not really learning to do a thing, unless you get at the reason for doing it.

332. Y. This is a word of the same character, and of nearly as much importance as the last. In the table (which look at very often) Y is exhibited as answering to our to it, to him, to her, to them, in the same sort of way that EN answers to the same pronouns with of or from before them. But Y, like en, does more than the table promises; for, it answers to at it, in it, at, or, in, that place; and, in short, to many other phrases. Y, like en, is confined to neither gender and to neither number. It is made to relate to persons as well as things; and, like en, it never changes its form.

In short, it performs the same functions as en, or very nearly the same, only the nouns or pronouns which it represents have to, at, in or by before them, instead of of or from. Let us, as before, take a few instances:

- 1. Il apprendra le François, parce qu'il s'y applique.
- 2. Avez-vous mis lo miroir dans la salle? 11 y est.
- 8. Ont-ils songé à mon affaire? Oui; ils y ont songé.
- 4. Pensez-vous à ce pauvre homme? Oui; j'y pense.
- 5. Ils m'ont fait des promesses; mais je ne m'y fie pas.
- 6. Ils ont fait le travail; mais ils n'y gagneront rien.
- 7. Allez à la campagne. J'y vais.

These may suffice. Let us, as we did before, translate them as literally as possible.

- 1. He will learn French, because that he himself to it applies.
- 2. Have you put the looking-glass in the parlour? It in it is.
- 3. Have they thought of my business? Yes; they to it have thought.
- 4. Do you think to this poor man? Yes; I to him think.
- 5. They to me have made promises; but I in them confide not.
- 6. They have done the work; but they by it will gain nothing.
- 7. Go to the country. I am thither going.

Observe: the French say think to, and not think of, a thing. Now, look at the power of this letter v. Here we have to it, in it, to him, in them, by it, and thither, all expressed in French by this word v. And, observe, as EN is, besides its capacities as pronoun, a preposition, answering to our in; so v is, besides its capacities as pronoun, an adverb, answering to our there, or, rather, thither.

333. On. I have, in the table, represented this word as answering to our one, they, we, and people. We shall find, however, that this is not all. But first, pray mind that this has nothing to do with our number one. We sometimes say, in English, "one thinks, one "eats, one sleeps," and the like. But this is not, in fact, English. It is a mere imitation of the French on, which has no more to do with number one than it has to do with nine. The French on is best answered by our they, or people; as:

They People } say, that we shall have war. On dit que nous aurons la guerre.

Sometimes we use we; and sometimes the impersonal; as, it is said that we shall have war. Indeed, we cannot be used in all cases: it cannot in the instance just given. It can never answer to the French on, except in a very large and unconfined sense, meaning all mankind, or at least a whole people. The on applies to persons only; but it applies, or by use is made to apply, to both genders and both numbers, and to all the persons, even to the first; for it is so convenient a word, that the French often make use of it instead of je. But, the great and regular use of it is, where we use the impersonal, or the participle with the verb to be; as:

On croit qu'il viendra, On lui a dit de venir, It is believed that he will come.

He has been told to come.

We do not say, one believes that he will come; one has told him to come. This is not in the character of our language. Indeed, it is shocking nonsense; because, as I said before, on is no more translated by one than it is by NINE. When we, in English, speak in very general terms, we may, and we do, now and then, make use of one as an indeterminate pronoun, but, mind, it can be merely for once and away; for if we attempt to keep it up, we find that we are gabbling a sort of broken English. The on is, you will observe, always in the nominative case. It is never the object in the sentence. When on is preceded by a word which ends with a vowel, it is written for the sake of better sound; as, après cela for dine: after that they dine. But, if on be repeated in the sentence, it must be written all the way through in the same way that it is at the beginning. I will not here insert any more examples. Several relating to on will be found in the next Exercise, which will of course relate to the whole of the Indeterminate Pronouns; of which there remains one to be attended to.

334. Sr. which sometimes becomes sol. The se is self or selves; and soi is the same word, in fact, but has generally a preposition before it. It has no other changes, and applies to the third persons of both numbers and both genders. But before you go any further, turn back to paragraph 129, where you will find my first mention of this pronoun, se. You will see the principal use to which it is applied. the paragraphs from 129 to 134 inclusive, contain all that is necessary to be said on the subject of se. 1 was, as you will see, obliged to treat of it fully there; because, without making the use of it clearly understood. I could not make myself comprehensible with regard to the reflected verbs, of which I was compelled to treat in that place. You will, therefore, now read that part over again with great attention. You will see the part that se acts in the conjugation of a verb. To this if we add a few instances of the manner of using soi, we may come to our promised Exercise on Indeterminate Pronouns. Soi, when used in a general sense, answers to our themselves, ourselves, or one's-self: as, people, or they, like themselves: in French, on s'aime soi-même. Again, people like themselves only; on n'aime que soi. The French word soi-disant has almost become English. It is, literally, self-saying. and, properly translated, it is, self-ealling, or selfstyling. I am now going to insert the Exercise relating to all these indeterminate pronouns. Consider well before you translate; and look back continually at your table and your rules.

335 Thus I close the Letter on the Syntax of Pronouns: and now, before I go to the Syntax of the remaining Parts of Speech, I shall give you a letter on the NEGATIVES and INTERROGATIVES, and another on the IMPERSONALS. But let me pray you to take great pains about the pronouns before you quit them. They are very important words; they occur in almost every sentence. They are little words of great meaning; and if great attention be not raid to their meaning, it is useless to read them, and even to write them. You now begin to know how to write a little French. That is a great thing. If hard pushed, you could write a note to a Frenchman to ask him to lend you a pony. is something gained, at any rate. You have only to persevere, and you will be able to write a letter in French to a French lady, most humbly beseeching her to honour you with her hand at a ball.

LETTER XX.

SYNTAX OF NEGATIVES AND INTERROGATIVES.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

336. Words of all the Parts of Speech come into negative and interrogative phrases. The words which are called negatives, belong principally to that part of speech which are called adverbs. But it is the placing of the words which is chiefly to be attended to in negative and interrogative sentences.

337. Our principal negatives are no and not, the former mostly applying to nouns and pronouns, and the latter to verbs, as, I have no apples, you do not walk. The French generally use two of these words where we use but one. We say, I possess no land: they say, je ne possède pas de terre; that is, I possess not of land. But, indeed, you cannot translate here word for word. Ne and PAs amount in this case to no; and they must be made use of to answer to it. Let us take our verb trouver, and conjugate it with the negatives; or, at least (for that will be enough), let us conjugate it as far as relates to the first person of each mode and time. We will put the infinitive also; for, in that case, both the French negatives come before the verb.

Not to find,
I do not find,
I did not find,
I shall not find,
I may not find,
I should not find,
I might not find,
I might not find,
Not finding,
Not found,

Ne pas trouver.
Je ne trouve pas.
Je ne trouvais pas.
Je ne trouverai pus.
Je ne trouver pus.
Je ne trouvasse pas.
Je ne trouvasse pas.
Ne trouvaut pus.
Ne pas trouvé.

In the compound times of the verb, the negative comes before and after the auxiliary; as:

Not to have found,
I have not found,
I had not found,
I shall not have found,
I may not have found,
I should not have found,
I might not have found,
Not having found,
Not being found,

Ne pas avoir trouvé.
Je n'ai pas trouvé.
Je n'avais pas trouvé.
Je n'aurai pas trouvé.
Je n'aie pas trouvé.
Je n'airais pas trouvé.
Je n'eusse pas trouvé.
N'ayant pas trouvé.
N'ejtant pas trouvé.
N'éjtant pas trouvé.

338. That is the way that we use the negatives with the verb; and here, as you see, no and pas together answer to our not. When we, in English, have a noun to use the negative with, and not a verb, we make use of no for our negative; as, I have no wine. The French, however, adhere to their no and pas; as, je n'ai pas do vin. Sometimes, however, point is used instead of pas. There is only this difference in them, that point always requires do before a noun that follows; and pas does not always require it. Point means, more decidedly, no, not, or none at all; as:

He does not know you (at all), Il ne vous connait point.
There is no man (at all), Il n'y a point d'homme.

But we may say indifferently, je n'ai pas d'argent; je ne possède pas de terre; or, je n'ai point d'argent; je ne possède point de terre. There are a few words that require pas exclusively; but these are of such common use as to prevent all chance of error.

339. The French use Non to answer to our no, when we put no other words; as, will you go with me? No. Voulez-vous aller avee moi? Non. This non sometimes becomes non pas, when the speaker wishes to give a very decided negative. In eases where we should say, no, indeed! the French would, perhaps, say, non pas; but the non being sufficient, it may be best to use it only. Our adverbial phrase NOT AT ALL is commonly expressed by pas du tout, or, in familiar speech, by du tout, dropping the pas. When we say, not that, the French do very often make use of non pas; as, I eat brown bread, not that I like it better than white; je mange du pain bis, non pas que je l'aime mieux que le blaue.

340. When there is a negative word, such as pas un, personne, aucun, nul, rien, nullement, quère, jamais, and some few others, the pas or point is not used at all; but ne is; as:

Je n'ai jamais été dans ce pays-là, Vous ne lui dites rien.

Elle n'a personne pour la consoler. She has nobody to console her. I have never been in that country. You say not hing to him, or, to her.

There are some others which are negatives in themselves, and, of course, they do not require the double negation. There are two words, a great deal used. that require the double negative always, except when used with dire and voir, to say, and to see. These two words are mot and goutte. The first means word; the last (in this negative sense) not a jot, or a bit, or the least. The word mot is (in this sense) understood to mean not a word. They are two very common expressions, and are used thus:

> Je ne disais mot. Je ne voyais goutte.

I said not a word. I saw nothing at all.

But, with other verbs than dire and roir, these are not looked upon as negative words; and, of course, they take the ne and pas, or point.

341. There are some words which require ne after them before the next verb, though there appears, at first sight, to be nothing of the negative quality in our English sentence that answers to any of those in which this NE is found; as:

Il craint que sa régolte ne soit gâtée, | l'Ie fears that his crop may be spoiled. A moins qu'il ne soit blessé, | Unless he should be wounded.

But though there may be no negative in the English phrase, there is fear or apprehension expressed that something may, and perhaps hope that something may not happen. If the same verbs do not express a feeling of this sort, then the two negatives are used in the usual manner.

- 342. Ne is used without pas or point, before the verb that follows plus, moins, mieux, autre, and autrement: also before verbs that are coupled by ni; and also after que and si, signifying until, unless, or but, when these come in a sentence, the former part of which is negative; as, je ne chante ni ne danse; I neither sing nor dance. Je ne lui écrirai pas qu'il ne m'envoic mes livres; I will not write to him unless he sends me my books.
- 343. But there are some cases in which the French use but one negative, though there be no other word of a negative nature in the sentence. These cases are worthy of particular attention; because, to use the two negatives instead of one, is a great and glaring error. I shall, therefore, be very particular in pointing out to you when the second negative is to be omitted.
 - 1. When de.follows the verb, and is used in the describing of a space of time; as:

Je ne lui parleral de ma vie, | I will not speak to him as long as I live.

2. With the adverb plus (more); as, je ne viendrai plus; I will come no more. But mind, this is only when our more is used in the sense of again, or in addition; for, when more is used in a comparison; when it is more than something, then the two negatives must be used. Pay attention to the following examples:

Jo n'en veux pas de plus belle que la vôtre, | I do not want any finer than yours. Il ne s'y en trouve pas de plus belle, | There is no finer to be seen there.

3. When in English we use but in a negative sense, or oxly, or nothing but, the French take que (which is their but, though it is sometimes also their than, their as, their that, their whom, or their which); they take their que, and leave out their pas and point:

Vous ne posséde que deux choses, l'Aou possess but two things. Il n'ont que peu de bien, l'Abey have but little property.

Our BUT, besides this, is turned into French sometimes by que with ne coming after it. And again, when the French si and que are used in the sense of unless, the ne is used without the pas or point.

- 4. Il y a is one of the IMPERSONAL verbs. You will see enough about them in the next Letter. This impersonal means sometimes it is; and when it is made use of in the present time of a verb used along with the verb avoir, the negative that follows it must be ne only; as, il y a trois jours que vous n'avez mangé; you have not eaten for these three days; or, literally, it is three days that you have not caten.
- 5. Ne may be used alone with the verbs oser, savoir, prendre garde, cesser, and pouvoir; and as these are very important verbs, and are constantly recurring, you ought to pay particular attention to this rule:

Ils n'osent vous le dire,: Il ne peut le faire, They dare not tell it you. He cannot do it.

It would, however, be perfectly correct to say,

Ils n'osent pas vous le dire, Il ne peut pas le faire;

and in these latter phrases the negative is more strongly and emphatically expressed.

6. When we employ why in the asking of a question, and the French do not employ pourquoi, but que, to answer to our why, then the ne is used without pas or point; as:

Que n'allez-vous la voir? Que ne parlez-vous? Why do you not go to see her?
Why do you not speak?

But mind, if you make use of pourquoi In French, and not of que, you must employ the double negative; as, pourquoi n'allez-vous pas la voir; pourquoi ne parlez-vous pas?

344. Read these rules over several times before you enter upon the Exercise. I do not suppose that you will carry them all in your head: but some part of some of them you will make fast in your mind at once; and as you read in books (for now you may begin to read French), these rules will occur to you; for, twenty times in an hour, perhaps, you will meet with passages to illustrate them.

- 64. Is not this a very cold summer?
- 65. Not colder than the last, though cold enough.

345. We now come to the INTERROGATIVES. When you consider how large a part of all speaking and writing consists of QUESTIONS, you will want nothing said by me to convince you of the importance of this part of your study. Let us take the verb trouver again here, and conjugate it in the interrogative form, as we did in the negative form; for, you will observe, that there must be a verb belonging to every negative and every question. I shall conjugate only a part of the verb; because it would be waste of room to put the whole conjugation.

Present Time, Singular.	{trouve-je? trouves-tu? trouve-t-il?	do I find? dost thou find? does he find?
Fresent Time, Plural.	frouvens-nous? trouvez-vous? trouvent-ils?	do we find? do you find? do they find?
Past Time, Singular.	{!rouvais-je ? trouvais-tu ? trouvait-il ?	did I find? didst thou find? did he find?
Past Time, Plural.	trouvions-nous? trouviez-vous? trouvaient-ils?	did we find? did you find? did they find?

That is enough. You see (and, indeed, you saw it long ago,) the French have no do and did, and will and shall, and the like. They ask the question by the verb itself. They say, find I? find we? find they? and so on. Nothing can be plainer than this. But before I proceed to show how questions are put if there be a noun instead of a pronoun, let me explain a little matter that may appear odd to you. You see all these French verbs connected with the pronouns by hyphens. This is a general rule; you see it in all cases. But in the first question of all, you see an accent over the \acute{e} in trouvé. This is to soften the sound; and the accent is used with this verb only in this particular case. See paragraph 191, for a full explanation of this; and see the close of that paragraph for the reason why there are a t and two hyphens placed after trouve in the third question above.

346. Well, then, the above is the manner in which the French put questions with the pronoun. Let us now see how they put questions where there is a noun; where they are asking something about a third party, and making use of the noun and not the pronoun. They begin by naming the party; as:

Richard est-il venu?
Pierre est-il malade?
Mes sœurs sont-elles arrivées?
Vos chevaux courent-ils?

Is Richard come?
Is Peter sick?
Are my sisters arrived?
Do your horses run?

347. But there is another manner of asking questions in French; and, indeed, it is the manner most in use. The question, let the persons or things be of what number or of what gender they may, begins with these words, EST-CE QUE. I put them in large letters; for you must become exceedingly well acquainted with them, they being everlastingly upon a French tongue:

Est-ce que vous avez diné?
Est-ce qu'elle s'en va?
Est-ce qu'il se porte bien?
Est-ce qu'il fuit froid?
Est-ce que nous avons de l'argent?
Est-ce que Richard est venu?
Est-ce que Jeun et l'ierre sont malades?

Have you dined?
Is she going away?
Is he well?
Is it cold?
Have we any money?
Is Richard come?
Are John and Peter sick?

What, then, is this Est-ce que? Word for word it is, is this that? or, is it that? And the first of these questions is, in fact, this: Is it that you have dined?

The French make use of ce, and not of il, as was observed in paragraph 321 (which I beg you to look at directly). They make use of this and not of it, but with this exception, there is nothing at all strange in the question, "Is it that you have dined?" We frequently, in Euglish, make use of expressions like this: "Is it that you disbelieve me that you do not attend to me?" "Is it that I am beneath your notice; or, is it that you cannot see your danger in neglecting my advice?" We do not, in English, make use of this manner, except in scrions discourse and writing; but the French make use of it in their familiar discourse. It rids them of all the stiffness and awkwardness that their questions would otherwise have. Trouvé-je? and Trouve-t-il? for iustance, become Est-ce que je trouve? and Est-ce qu'il trouve? and all is smooth and harmonions.

348. But let me beg of you to pay great attention to this Est-ce; for it is surprising how great are the functions that it performs. Sometimes it has the que after it, and sometimes before it:

Est-ce qu'elle est riche?

N'est ce pas qu'elle est riche?

Qu'est-ce que c'est?

Qu'est-ce que c'est que Jean dit?

Is she not rich?

What is it?

What does John say?

Literally, it is, what (or which) is this that this is that John says? Never think it wild or foolish; it is all right enough, and that you will find in a short time. Do not waste your time in finding fault with the French language; learn it as quickly as you can.

Qu'est-ce que c'est que cela? What is that?

There are various other ways of turning such phrases, some more, some less frequent or elegant; as:

Est-ce qu'elle n'est pas riche?
N'est-elle pas riche?
Est-elle riche?
Qu'est-ce que Jean dit?
Qu'est-ce que celu?
Qu'est-ce?

Is she not rich?
Is not she rich?
Is she rich?
What does John say?
What says John?
What is that?
What is it?

[Note.—There are some who tell us that the phrase Qu'est-ce que c'est que is merely vulgar, or at least old-fashioned, and that the use of it should not be taught: also that Qu'est-ce que, and even Est-ce que, as we see them in the foregoing examples, should rather be avoided, as cumbersome. They are, however, very common expressions in practice; although Que dit-il? What does he say? may be much better than Qu'est-ce que c'est qu'il dit? or even than Qu'est-ce qu'il dit?

Qu'est-ce que vous voulez?
or Que voulez-vous?
Qu'est-ce que vous dites?
or
Que dites-vous?
Qu'est-ce que vous demandez?
Or
Que dites-vous?
What do you say?
What do you say?
What do you say?

What do you say?

Is his father at home?

Est-ce-que sa sœur est à l'école?
or
Sa sœur est elle à l'école?

The latter form, in each of these, is said to be the one preferable.]

LETTER XXI.

SYNTAX OF IMPERSONALS.

My DEAR RICHARD,

350. You must now go back to paragraph 136. There I have explained the nature of the Impersonals. You must read from that paragraph to 141 very attentively. Pray observe, that what I am now going to say you will be able to understand but very imperfectly, unless you first go back and read very attentively the paragraphs just mentioned.

351. There are, then, four principal IMPERSONALS; that is to say, IL Y A, IL EST or C'EST, IL FAUT, and IL FAIT. Let us take them one by one.

352. IL Y A answers to our there is, or there are; and some; as:

There is a hawk on the tree,
There are bilds in the nest,
Some men like that,
Some of them did not like it,
There will be ten bushels of wheat.

il y a un faucon sur l'arbre, il y a des oiscaux dans le nid. il y a des hommes qui alment cela, il y en dvatt qui ne l'almaient p-is, il y aura dix boisseaux de blé.

This impersonal changes its form to express time and mode; but not for any other purpose. You see, in the above examples, the present il y a, the past il y avait, and the future il y aura.

353. We, in speaking of distances from place to place, make use of it is; as, it is twenty-six miles from London to Windsor. The French, in such cases, make use of il y a, and say, il y a vingt-six milles de Londres à Windsor; which is, mind, literally speaking, it there has twenty-six miles from London to Windsor. And this is just as reasonable as to say it is; for one might ask, what is? What do you mean by this it?

354. The same rule applies to our it is, when employed to designate a space of time; as, it is four months since I came hither; il y a quatre mois que je suis iei. When we speak of something that happened some time ayo, the French answer our phrase by il y a and the present time of the verb; as:

That tree was planted fifty years ago, | Il y a cinquante ans que cet arbre est planté.

355. In questions where we begin with how long, or how far, and then proceed with our is it; in these cases the French begin with combien; that is, how much or how many. You know that how is comment, and that far is loin; but you must not, when you go to France, and are on the road from Calais to Paris, and want to know how far you have to go to get to St. Omers; you must not, in this case, say to the person to whom you address yourself, comment loin (how far), but combien (how much, or how many). Thus it is, too, with regard to space of time, and with regard to numbers. And mind, when a question is asked, the order of the words of the impersonal is reversed. $y \, a$ -t-il, and not $il \, y \, a$. You see that the t and the double hyphen are used here. You have seen the reason for this at the close of paragraph 345; at which, however, you may now take another look. Take now a few examples:

· How many cities are there in France? |
How much sand is there in the cart?

How fur is it from this to St. Omers? How long is it since you began? Combien de villes y a-t-il en France? Combien de suble y a-t-il dans la charrette?

Combien y a-t-il d'ici à St. Omer? Combien y a-t-il que vous avez commencé? You see, then, the extensive use of this Impersonal. It is constantly on the tongue of those who speak French. Great care must be taken to give it its proper place in the sentence. That place is different under different eircumstances; but attention will very soon make you master of the matter.

356. It est, or c'est. Look at paragraph 321. I had there, in speaking of the Demonstrative Pronoun ce, to explain to you the reason of this c'est; but I then referred you to this place for instructions as to the manner of using c'est. Literally, il est means it is, and c'est (that is, ce est) means this is, as I have before shown. In some cases they may, as impersonal verbs, be made use of indifferently; but in other cases they cannot. The sense will, in a great measure, instruct us when one is to be used, and when the other; but this may be always relied on, that when the impersonal can be translated into English by that, this, or what, the French must be c'est, and not il est; as:

That is what pleases me,
This is what I thought,

C'est ce qui me plait.
C'est ce que je pensais.

And not il est cela, and il est ce que.

357. When the noun which the impersonal refers to is not a person, and when there is no adjective followed by a verb coming next after the impersonal, or when the word thing is, under any circumstances, expressed in the sentence, c'est, and not il est, is to be used. But, if there be an adjective so coming directly after the impersonal, and if the word thing be not mentioned in the sentence, il est is used.

[Note.—One cannot in a few words fully explain when to use the one and when the other, il est or c'est. But, in the first place, it may be said that il est, used impersonally, applies only to things or circumstances, as distinguished from persons, while c'est applies to all things, persons included. Thus the French say, c'est l'homme qui, it is the man who; c'est l'arbre qui, it is the tree which; c'est moi, toi, lui, elle, nous qui, it is I, thou, he, she, we who. But it est, in accordance with the rule stated in the foregoing paragraph, applies only in such cases as the following, where the use of it and that of ce will be seen contrasted:

Il est impossible de eonnaître tout le monde, t'est une chose impossible, Oui, ce serait impossible,

Il etait désendu d'en parler, C'était son frère qui m'en a parlé,

Il est à croire que cela arrivera,

C'est déjà de fait,

Il est fâcheux de devoir vous

C'est facheux, mais c'est votre faute,

Il est agréable d'entendre chanter les oiseaux,

Non seulement agréable; c'est délicieux,

It is impossible to know everybody.

It is a thing impossible.

Yes, it would be impossible.

It was forbidden to speak of it.

It was his brother who spoke to me of it.

It is to be believed that that will happen.

It is already the fact.

It is unfortunate to have to leave

It is unfortunate, but it is your fault.

It is agreeable to hear the birds sing.

Not only agreeable; it is delightful.

What is here expressed by il may be considered as something merely supposed, or in contemplation, because the il is connected in meaning with nothing but the phrases, de connaître tout le monde, d'en parler, que cela arrivera, and so on. But the ce (this, that, or it), which is a demonstrative pronoun, points to the different persons or things as having actual existence, so far at least as this, that they stand identified by a noun or pronoun, or are recognized subjects of previous remark. One thing helping to explain the difference is, that where the ce is used we might, instead, often use the word cela: oni, cela est impossible; cela* est déjà de fait; cela* est délicieux.]

358. This impersonal is sometimes used instead of il y a: but in this case il est is used; and not c'est: as, il est des gens qui ne sont jamais contens; there are people who are never contented. We may say, also, it y a des gens qui ne sont jamais contens. But mind, you cannot always use il est for il y a. It is only when the nonn referred to is a plural, and of a general and indefinite character, like gens. [Grammarians differ as to the use of il est in place of il y a. CHAMBAUD calls it an elegance to write, Il est des amitiés véritables, there are true friendships (instead of il y a). Some condemn this altogether, except with a negative, as: il n'est rien qui me plaise davantage, there is nothing that pleases me more; il n'est rien tel que d'avoir du bonheur, there is nothing like having good fortune.] And mind, you cannot employ c'est to supply the place of il y a.

359. Il est, and not c'est, is used in speaking of portions of time as counted by the clock, or as relating to the different times of the day. The French do not say it is twelve o'clock (which is a very odd phrase), but, it is twelve hours. They say, it is one hour, it is two hours, and so on. Now, in saying this, they do not use c'est, but il est; thus, il est une heure, il est deux heures. But, in answer to questions relating to time, c'est may be used. When we ask what it is o'clock, they say, quelle heure est-il? and not quelle heure est-ce?

360. I noticed in the rules on the articles, that we say, he is a captain, she is a mantua-maker, and so on;

and that the French say, he is captain, she is mantuamaker, without the article. In these cases they use the personal pronoun de and il; but if the French use the article, they use c'est.

361. In all other eases c'est may be, and indeed ought to be, used. This impersonal may be used in the plural of the verb of the third person. It may, indeed, be also used in the singular of that person; but, it is used in the plural also; as:

C'est les loups qui ont tué les moutons. Ce sont les loups qui ont tué les moutons.

But in interrogations the impersonal adheres, in all cases, to the third person singular of the verb to be; as:

Est-ce les loups qui ont tué les moutons? Est-ce le loup qu'on a attrapé?

362. It faut comes next. This impersonal, like most other good and useful things, is to be rendered available to us only by great labour and attention. I explained the source and the nature of it in paragraph 139. I am now about to explain to you the manner of using it. But I must beg you to read that paragraph very attentively. If I did not suppose that you would do this, I should repeat the whole of it again here; for that which I am now going to say is nothing, that is, it will be of no use, unless you first read that paragraph with great care.

363. You see, then, that no two things can be more unlike than the two languages are in this respect. The il funt consists of the pronoun that answers to our it, and of a part of the verb to be necessary; and, taken together, they answer to our must, but in some cases to a great deal more than our must. For instance, faut-il aller chez-lui? Is it necessary to go to his house? Then, our must cannot be translated literally into French. I must, we must, and the like, cannot be expressed in French at all, if they stand thus without other words. I must go. To answer to this, the French say, il faut que j'aille; that is, it is necessary that I go, or, I am obliged to go, or, there is compulsion for my going.

364. And mind, this il faut applies to all persons and all things: to me, to you, to him, to her, to it, and, in short, to all nouns and pronouns. It states that there is necessity, or obligation: then comes the noun or pronoun representing the party obliged; then comes the statement of what the necessity or obligation is to produce; as:

Il faut que je fasse, Il faut que vous fassiez, Il faut qu'il fasse, Il faut qu'ils fassent, Il faut que nous fassions, I must make. you must make. he must make. they must make. we must make.

There is, in these cases, always a que, you see, coming after the il faut; and you have seen the reason of this before. The French words, being literally translated, mean: it is necessary that I make, and so on; and que, in this case, means that.

365. But it is not thus in all cases; for there is no que when il faut is followed by the infinitive of the verb; as, il faut aller; it is necessary to go. Mind, the infinitive is often used thus in French to answer to English phrases in which the verb is not in the infinitive; as:

Il faut faire son devoir,

one must do one's duty.
we must do our duty.
they must do their duty.

And, in many cases, the phrase may take this turn in English: one's duty must be done.

366. Where we, in English, express a want of something the French sometimes make use of the verb avoir, followed by besoin (want) and de; as, I. want a stick, j'ai besoin d'un bâton. This French phrase literally is, I have want of a stick. And this is an expression in great use.

J'ai besoin d'or, Vous aviez besoin d'une chaise, Ils auront besoin d'une brouette,

I want some gold. you wanted a chair. they will want a wheelbarrow.

Now mind, il faut is, in many cases, made use of instead of avoir besoin de. But then the phrase must take a different form, and the pronoun must be in the objective case; as:

li me fant de l'or,

Il vous fallait une chaise,

Il leur faudra une brouette,

I want some gold. you wanted a chair.

they will want a wheelbarrow.

Pay great attention to this turn of the phrase; for it is in these seemingly little matters that much of the most useful part of your study lies.

367. Sometimes we express want by the use of the passive verb; that is to say, by the passive participle of to want and the verb to be; as, men are wanted to make an army. Here il jaut is the expression; as, il faut des hommes pour faire une armée.

Pour faire la guerre il faut de l'argent, | To make war there must be money.

368. When we speak of the manner of doing a thing, or of the manner of being, or of the manner of conducting one's-self, and employ, in phrases of this description, ought or should; as, you do not know what you ought; in these eases the French employ il faut; as:

You work as you ought,
They do not write as they should,
They do what they ought,
I have what I ought to have,

vous travaillez comme il faut.
ils n'écrivent pas comme il faut.
ils font ce qu'il faut.
j'ai ce qu'il me faut.

Comme il faut means, also, as it is necessary to be, as it is proper to be, and hence come the expressions, des gens comme il faut, une femme comme il faut, and so on; which mean, respectable people, a respectable woman; or, literally, people as they ought to be, a woman as she ought to be.

369. IL FAIT is the last of these impersonal verbs. Literally it means, it makes. This is an expression so different in its nature from that by which we effect the same purposes, that it is necessary to notice it; though this impersonal is not of very extensive use. It is nearly confined to phrases relating to the weather, or the state the air and sky, or that of the ground as affected by the elements. We say, for instance, it is fine weather; the French say, il fait beau temps; that is, it makes fine weather; for temps is weather as well as time. Thus, they say:

Il fait froid,	it is cold.
Il fait chaud,	it is hot.
Il fait jour,	it is light.
Il fait sombre,	it is dark.

Il fait is used in some other cases, when the English it is relates to one's being well or ill off with respect to eincumstances of place; but this is rather a liberty than otherwise. As to rain, there is the verb and the noun, pleuvoir and pluie; and it is the same with hail and snow. However, the French frequently say, tomber (to fall) de la pluie, de la grêle, de la neige: and they even put il fait before these nouns, as well as before the adjectives jour and nuit, light and dark, not day and night.

370. Now, before I give you the exercise on these IMPERSONAL Verbs, I ought to observe, that every phrase may be called an Impersonal, if it be the nominative, and if there be no noun to which the it relates; as, it suits well to ride on horseback. Here is no noun that the it refers to; or, at least, there is no noun that you can name. The verb valor (to be worth) is one of those which is often used in the impersonal form, and it is in great use. Employed in this way, it answers to our is better, was better, is not so good, and the like; as:

It is better,
It was better,
It will be better,
It is not so good as,
It was not so good as,
It will not be so good as,

il vant mieux.
il valait mieux.
il vaudra mieux.
il ne vant pes tant que.
il ne valait pas tant que.
il ne vaudra pas tant que.

This is, then, a word of great consequence. The French, you see, say, it is worth better, and not, it is better. And we sometimes say, in English, that one thing is better worth a pound than another is worth a penny. You know this verb well; you have it fully conjugated at paragraph 237; and you have it in your table of irregular verbs on your card. From this verb comes the appellation of Vaurien, which means a good-for-nothing person. This verb, used as impersonal, answers also to our worth while, the French using peine instead of while; thus, it is not worth while, il ne vaut pas la peine; that is, it is not worth the trouble or labour.

- 52. It has been a very fine day to-day.
- 53. Do you believe that? Is there any one that believes
 - it? Is there any one of them who does not despise the man who says it?

I must not dismiss this subject without a remark or two upon the nature of the Impersonals. In my English Grammar, I contended that Dr. LOWTH, Mr. LINDLEY MURRAY, and others, were in error in supposing that plural nouns and pronouns ought never to be placed after our IT, used as an impersonal. I gave an instance in this phrase: "IT is the dews and showers "which make the grass grow." I contended that it was proper, because the verb is did not relate to dews and showers; but to IT, which it meant, if well looked into, a state of things. Now, it is the same in French; for we say, "C'Est les loups qui tuent les moutons." I, in my Grammar, paragraph 60, contended, that though there was no visible noun to which the it related, yet that there would be found to be a noun understood, if the matter were well looked into. I took as an instance, "it will rain;" and I said that the full meaning was this: "A STATE OF THINGS called rain WILL BE." In consulting the work of Monsieur Restaut, I find him agreeing with me as to this matter. He takes the instance of "il plent," and he says, that the full meaning is, "QUELQUE CHOSE qui est la pluie EST." The utility of this explanation is great: for it gives you the reason for using nouns and pronouns in the plural after it is, it was, it will be, and so forth; and to do a thing well with a reason is a great deal better than to do it well without a reason. We say, in English, IT IS THEY who write. BISHOP LOWTH says that this is not correct.

No? What will he put, then? The French, however, settle the question for us; for they say, c'est eux qui écrivent; c'est les lours qui tuent les moutons. [In praetiee, the French here use the verb cither in the singular or in the plural, with the plural noun or pronoun, as already shown in the example in paragraph 361: c'est (or ce sont) eux; c'est (or ce sont) les lours.]

[Note.—There are several verbs, besides those here particularly mentioned, which are constantly used as impersonals. These are referred to in paragraph 370. The most important of them are the following:

AOIR DE, ARRIVER, CONVENIR,
IMPORTER, PARAÎTRE, SUBFFIRE, SUFFIRE,

to have to do with, or affect.
to happen, or come to pass.
to become, or be fitting.
to matter, or be of consequence.
to appear.
Substitute to suffice, or be chough.

These, like the verb être, are used with il in the third person; as: il s'agit de la vie, it is a question of life; il arrive quelque fois, it sometimes happens; il me convient, it is fit, or proper for me; and so on.]

LETTER XXII.

SYNTAX OF ADJECTIVES.

My DEAR RICHARD,

371. I went, in the Etymology, very fully into the subject of adjectives. You will now read what I there said. You will find it between paragraphs 101 and 111, both inclusive; and you must read those ten over now with great care; because, if you do not, you cannot well understand the matter now about to be addressed to you. In those paragraphs I very fully described the nature and properties and offices of this part of speech; I described its changes for the purpose of expressing gender and number and comparison; I gave the rules for the making of these changes; and I told you that you would learn from the Syntax how to glace adjectives in sentences, which, as I then told you, is a matter of some importance. However, there are other things to attend to now besides the proper placing of the adjectives.

372. You have seen that adjectives change their form to express gender and number. That is all, however; for they have no change to express person, time, case, or mode. Therefore, this is not a part of speech so full of difficulties as the pronoun and the verb. There are two things to attend to in using the adjective; first, to see that it agrees in number and gender with the noun to which it relates; and, next, to see that it be put in its proper vlace. As to the agreement, enough was said in the Etymology, except with regard to one or two particular cases, which I am now about to notice. The adjective is put in the plural, though it relate to a singular noun, when that noun is a noun of multitude and followed by a plural noun in the possessive case; as:

La plupart des dames furent malheureuses,

The greater part of the ladies were unhappy.

and not

La plupart des dames fut malheureuse, The greater part of the ladies was unhappy.

If plupart had not been followed by des dames (the noun in the possessive case), the adjective must have been in the singular:

La plupart fut malheureuse.

and not

La plupart furent malheureuses.

Another of the exceptions alluded to above, is this: adjectives are put in the plural when they relate to more than one singular norm. To be sure; for two or more singulars make a plural; as, Richard et Thomas sont malades, and not malade. This is the general rule; but when there are two singular nouns to which the adjective relates, and when these nouns have the same, or nearly the same, meaning, writers sometimes put the adjective in the singular. I merely mention this because it is a liberty that writers take; but I do not recommend you to take it. You may say:

Un goût et un discernement ex- An excellent taste and discerncellent, ment.

But it is better to say,

Un goût et un discernement excellens.

As to agreement in gender, you must observe, that, if there be more than one noun to which the adjective relates, and if they be of different genders, the adjective must be put in the masculine; as:

La vache et le bœuf sont bons (not bonnes), The cow and the ox are good.

But, if there be two or more uouns, one or more of which is a feminine, and if in such a case a feminine noun come immediately before the adjective, the adjective is, or at least may be, put in the feminine; as:

Le bouf et la vache blanche | The white ox and cow. (not blancs),

And, observe, the adjective is put in the singular, too, in this case, though there are two nouns going before it. However, as it certainly would not be incorrect to say, le bouf et la vache blancs, I should employ that phrase instead of the other. These exceptions, though worthy of notice, are but mere trifles. Nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of every thousand, the adjective must agree in number and gender with the noun or nouns to which it obviously relates.

373. Care must, therefore, be taken to put the adjective in its proper place. You have, as you have already been taught, first to take care that your adjective agree in gender and number with its noun. The next thing is the proper place for the adjective. You are speaking of a cow, for instance. You want to say, in French, that she is brown. You know that the singular number of the adjective is without an s; you know also, that the feminine of this adjective is brune, there being an e added to brun. But, you do not know whether it be to come before or after, the noun rache. Observe, then, that adjectives which express colours are put after the noun; as, vache brune.

Also those that express nationality; as, du drap Anglais.

Also those that express shape; as, chapeau rond.

Also those that express the qualities or condition of the elements, or that relate to any natural productions; as, de l'eau froide.

Also those which end in ic, ique, and if; as, un verbe passif.

Also those ending in able; as, un état misérable. [Though some of these may cither follow or precede; as, une personne aimable, or une aimable personne.]

Also those ending in esque, ile, ule; as, une pièce burlesque.

Also the participles when they are used as adjectives; as, an homme respecté. [Or when they are derived from the verb; as, un ouvrage divertissant.]

374. Adjectives put before the noun are all those of number; as, une porte, six earosses; le premier bourg, le second village. The Royal style, indeed, makes Henry the Fourth, Louis the Eighteenth, and so on. [It should be noticed that in speaking of Sovereigns, the Freuch use the Cardinal number, and not the Ordinal, saying, Henri Quatre, and not Quatrième; Louis Dix-huit, and not Dix-huitième. So with the days of the month: it must be le trois de Mars, le quatre de Juin; and not le troisième, le quatrième: except with the first day, with which the ordinal number, le premier, must be used, and the second day, which may be called either le deux or le second.]

- 'Also pronouns when they act the part of adjectives; as, chaque prune.
 - Also the following ones of very common use: beau, bon, brave, cher, ehetif, grand, gros, jeune, joli, mauvais, méchant, meilleur, moindre, petit, saint, vieux, vrai.
- 375. When there are two adjectives used with the same noun, you may sometimes put them before the noun; but you cannot do wrong in putting them after it. If there be more than two adjectives, they must follow the noun. There are some exceptions to these rules; but these are of no importance. If you attend well to the above, you will in a short time place your adjectives properly.
- 376. So much for the placing of the adjectives. We have three more things to attend to relating to this part of speech. The first of these is, that there are certain adjectives which, in French, require the preposition de before the next noun, pronoun, or infinitive verb; as, capable de tout; capable d'aller. Then there are other adjectives which require the preposition à before the next noun, pronoun, or infinitive; as, semblable à l'or. These adjectives are, however, too many in number to be inserted in a rule. If, at any time, you have a doubt about the matter, the Dictionary will put you right; for it has the à, or the de, placed after those adjectives that require these prepositions after them. [See paragraph 431, and the Note at the end of paragraph 454.]
 - 377. The next thing is, that adjectives of dimension eome before the words which express the measure, and not after those words, as ours do; as:

Une rivière large de trois cents pas, | a river three hundred paces broad. Une tour haute de soixante pieds, | a tower sixty feet high.

The French, however, have other modes of expressing dimensions. They put the noun instead of the adjective; une rivière qui a trois cents pas de largeur. Thus they make use of longueur and of hauteur, leaving out the adjective altogether. However, this is no very important matter: one exercise of a dozen sentences is quite enough to prevent you from ever making a mistake in the use of these words of dimension.

378. Lastly comes comparison; but that has been so fully explained before, in the paragraphs from 101 to 111, and again more recently in the use of que and moins and plus with the negatives, that it would be, I hope, a waste of time to say anything more upon the subject of comparison.

EXERCISE XIII.

- 1. The tower is four hundred and forty feet high.
- 2. Your room is twenty feet long and ten wide.
- 3. A square field and a high gate.
- 4. A saucy, lazy, and foolish man.
- 5. A young and fine ox, and a pretty little dog.
- 6. He is a great deal older than she is.
- 7. You are not so tall as he by a great deal.
- 8. They have more than six thousand acres of land.
- This is a very bad hat; the worst I ever had in my life.
- 10. This is a better day than yesterday: but this is cold and miserable enough.
- 11. This is the worst road I ever saw.

- 12. That is the greatest rogue that exists.
- 13. Have you many bottles of wine in your cellar?
- 14. Give him a little wine and a few grapes.
- 15. I have not much oil, but I have a great many olives.
- 16. Has he not many horses and a great deal of hay?
- 17. Give me a few uuts, and bring a little of that sugar.
- 18. He is equally zealous in a good and in a bad cause.
- Sixty thousand pounds for an estate and household goods.
- 20. One thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.
- 21. London, fourth of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four.
- 22. George the Fourth and Charles the Tenth reign at this time.
- 23. I like an open enemy better than a secret one.
- 24. You are unworthy of honour and distinction.
- 25. He was overjoyed at seeing her arrive.
- 26. They are perfectly free from blame on that account.
- 27. He is fit for any sort of business.
- 28. They are given to all sorts of mischief.
- 29. We are subject to a legal process for your neglect.
- 30. He is a man very much esteemed in that country.
- 31. She is a French woman, he is an Englishman, she is an American woman.
- 32. A French hat, an English coat, an American shoe.
- 33. A black hat, a blue coat, white shocs.
- 34. White as suow, black as the chimney, heavy as lead.
- 35. You are taller than he by two inches.
- 36. I do not think that he is so tall as she.
- 37. They are the most wicked of all maukind.
- 38. It is the most unjust and most abominable of acts.

It should be noticed that there are some adjectives which have one sense when placed before the noun, and another sense when placed after it; as, un howime honnête, means a civil or well-behaved man; but un hounête homme, means an honest man. Un grand homme, means a man of great merit; but un homme grand, means a man of a great size. Une femme sage, means a sensible and modest woman; but une saue femme, means a midwife. However, there are very few adjectives that vary their meaning thus, and you will find little difficulty in the use of them. It is, nevertheless, a matter not to be disregarded. I know of no adjectives that thus change their meaning except bon, commun, mauvais, brave, certain, cruel, furieux, galant, gentil, grand, gros, honnête, pauvre, plaisant, sage, vilain. There are some words, which some persons call adjectives, which are indeclinable; that is, which do not change their form to express number and gender. But these are, in fact, adverbs, and not adjectives: they express place, time, or manner, and not quality or characteristic mark.

LETTER XXIII.

SYNTAX OF VERBS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

379. This, as you have been before told, is the most important of all the parts of speech. There can, as I have observed in my English Grammar, be no sentence, there can be no sense in words, unless there be a verb, either expressed or understood. Each of the other parts of speech may alternately be dispensed with, but the verb never can. This being the case, you will, I hope, set about the study of this Letter with an uncommon degree of resolution to be industrious and attentive.

380. You must, that you may have the whole subject clearly before you, that you may not drop abruptly into the middle of it, go back to paragraph 36, where I have described the nature and character and functions of the verb, and shown how it differs from other parts of speech. You must then go to paragraph 112, and read from that to paragraph 141 inclusive. When you have done that, and in a very attentive manner, cast your eye over the Conjugations; and then come to the subject of the present letter.

381. The parts of the Grammar which I have here referred to, teach you what a verb is, distinguish it from other parts of speech, show you all the variations of form to which it is liable, tell you how it changes that form to fit itself to divers circumstances; but it remains for me to tell you something about the manner of using it in sentences, something about that concord and that government, which I mentioned in paragraph 247; something about when the verb is to be used in this number, and when in that number; when in this person, and when in that; when in this time, and when in that; and when in this mode, and when in that. I shall, therefore, place my matter under four heads: first, The Number and Person, because they depend one on the other; second, The Times; third, The Modes; fourth, The Participles.

382. THE NUMBER AND PERSON. The verb must have a noun or a pronoun used with it. The verb speaks of an action, a feeling, or a state of being of some person or thing; therefore there must be a noun or a pronoun to express that person or thing: and, whatever person and number that noun and pronoun may be in, the verb must be in the same person and number. This is what is called agreement, or concord. The ploughmen in Hampshire invariably say, they walks, and the like; and it is very curious that those of Norfolk and Suffolk as invariably say, he walk, and the like. The illiterate country people in France say, j'allons and j'avons. This is not to be expected from any person who has ever looked into a book: but, in writing French, we English people must take care, or else we shall fall into very gross errors of this sort.

383. When two or more nouns, or pronouns, are the nominative of the same verb, the verb is in the plural number, though each of the nouns and pronouns be in the singular number. They are taken together, and thus they make a plural, and, of eourse, the verb must be in the plural; as:

Le cheval, le bouc, et le chien étaient dans l'écurie, The horse, the goat, and the dog were in the stable.

384. In French, as in English, two nouns or pronouns, with ou (or) between them, take the verb in the singular, because the or, though it connect them on the paper and in speech, disjoins them in sense; as:

Le seigle ou l'orge qui est dans le champ, The rye or the barley that is in the field.

But in French, if the conjunction be not ou, the verb is generally in the plural; as:

Ni le seigle ni l'orge ne se vendent cher, Neither the rye nor the barley sells dear.

Here, you see, the verb is in the plural in French, and in the singular in English. If there be several nouns, which are nominatives of the verb, and if there be one or more of them in the plural number, the verb must be in the plural, though some of the nouns may be in the singular; as:

Le maître ou ses gens viendraient demain, si.... The master or his people would come to-morrow, if....

This holds good in both languages; but if the last noun be in the singular, and be preceded by mais (but), the verb is put in the singular. This happens when there is non-seulement (not only), or some phrase of that meaning, in the former part of the sentence. It is, however, the same in both languages; and no error can well happen in the constructing of such sentences. But there is one difference in the two languages, respecting the number of the verb, that must be carefully attended to; it is this: we, in English, when we use a noun of multitude, such as crowd, assembly, public, or any other, may, as we please, consider the noun as a singular or a plural, and of course we may use, as relating to such noun, pronouns and verbs in the singular or in the plural. This cannot be done in French. Whatever the noun is, the pronoun and the verb must agree with it. Examples:

The crowd made a great noise,
They were in the street,
or,
It was in the street,
The public do not like that,
They have rejected it,
or,
It has rejected it,

The French adhere to this even in the use of the word people. They say, as we do, le peuple; but they always make the word a singular, and give it singular pronouns and verbs. We, on the contrary, cannot very well use these singulars with people, though we, in speaking of a nation, sometimes say, a people. In other cases we make use of plurals with the word people, and the French never do; as:

The people are tired of being treated in that manuer, Le peuple est las d'être traité de la sorte.

They will not be treated thus much longer, Il ne souffrira pas qu'ou le traite long-temps ainsi.

The people have their follies; but they are not wicked, Le peuple a ses folies; mais il n'est pas méchant.

Thus, you see, pronoun, verb, adjective, all are in the singular in French; and, in English, the two former are in the plural, and the latter has no change to express number. But there are some few exceptions to this; and those you will find particularly dwelt on in the Syntax of the Relative Pronoun, paragraph 316; and in the Syntax of the Adjective, paragraph 372. You must now read both those paragraphs very carefully over. Their contents belong to the numbers of verbs, as well as to the heads under which they are placed.

385. When there are two or more pronouns, which are the nominative of the verb, and which are of different persons, the nominative must agree with the first person in preference to the second, and with the second in preference to the third. It is, however, the same in English; as, you and I are poor, vous et moi nous sommes pauvres. Mark, however, the manner of forming these phrases in French. You see there is a pronoun more here in French than in English:

Vous et moi nous irons à la campagne la semaine prochaine, You and 1 shall go to the country next week.

Lui, Monsieur Lechamp, et moi nous nous en allons, He, Mr. Lechamp, and I are going away.

Elle, vous et votre oncle vous alliez vous promener, She and you and your uncle were going to take a walk.

Sentences of this sort may be turned thus:

Nous irons à la campagne vous et moi la semaine prochaine, Vous alliez vous promener, elle, vous et votre oncie.

However, the verbs are in the plural in both languages; and that is the main thing that you have to attend to here. I might, in the Letter on Personal Pronount, have spoken of this manner of using these pronouns; but I thought it would be best here, when I came to speak of the agreement between the pronoun and the verb. You see the additional pronoun is used to make all elear. Our mode of expression is not so unequivocal. Take an example:

He, she, and I have been very ill.

We understand this very well. We are almost sure that it is meant that all three have been sick; but it really is not a point beyond dispute. The French say, therefore:

Lui, elle et moi nous avons été très malades, He, she, and I we have been very ill.

And, to a certainty, this is a better mode of expression, because it is perfectly unequivocal.

[Note.—The examples from M. Restaut which are given in paragraph 316, touching the relative pronoun and the antecedent, should also be referred to in this place, because they equally have to do with the number of the verb. They are the examples beginning with the names Cicero, Hégésisochus, Ctésias, in which occur the verbs être, travailler, and avoir. Cobbett's Grammar has been criticised for not condemning the use of the verb in the singular number in all such eases; because while, in the first example,

Cicero fut un de ceux qui furent, the verb is rightly in the plural, as having relation to the pronoun ceux, it ought, in the other sentences given, to have been > un de ceux qui travaillèrent (and not travailla), un des premiers qui aient (and not ait); and for the same reason, namely, that these two latter verbs have relation to the ceux and the premiers.

It has been said that to use the verb, as here, in the singular, is bad French, and that modern writers do not do it. No doubt it is strictly an error. Nevertheless, it is frequently seen with French writers to the present day. Rollin says, d'Egypte qui ait conquis l'île de Cypre."

Amasis est le seul des rois Amasis is the only king of Egypt who has subdued the Isle of Cypres.

Here it is clear that the verb is correctly in the singular, there having been but the one king who subdued, Amasis. Yet we find CHATEAUBRIAND writing,

"Mon pèlerinage au tombeau de Scipion est un de ceux qui a le plus satisfait mon cœur," | My pilgrimage to the tomb of Scipio is one of those which has most gratified my feelings.

Properly, this should have been, in French as in English.

un de ceux qui ONT, | one of those which HAVE, in the plural; and the error arises, obviously, from a certain degree of confusion which is occasioned by there being two antecedents, one singular and the other plural, our thoughts being most engaged with the former of the two.

386. You will see that the verb is placed in the sentence much about in the same manner that ours is. when nouns are used with it: but when pronouns are used, very different is the manner of placing the French verb; of which, indeed, you have seen instances enough. When the verb has a noun or nouns as its nominative, its place is, as in English, after the noun; as, le mouton mange l'herbe, l'oiseau vole dans l'air. Thus it is also in English. But, in both languages, when a sentence is thrown into the middle of the main sentence, the verb goes first; as:

I will not give it to you, said Richard, unless you come after it, Je ne vous le donnerai pas, dit Richard, à moins que vous ne veniez le chercher.

This manner of using the verb is, in eases like this, the same in both languages. But the French sometimes put the verb before the noun when we do not, especially after que (whom, which, or that) and comme (as):

> Le chien que m'a vendu le garde-chasse, The dog that to me has sold the game-keeper.

This is word for word; but we say, the dog that the game-keeper has sold me. Take an example with comme:

Les choux, les asperges, et les oignons sont gâtés, comme me dit Richard,

The cabbages, the asparagus, and the onions are spoiled, as Richard tells me.

Again, the verb is frequently put after où (where, in which, in which place):

La campagne où dem ure mon ami,
The country place where my friend lives.
L'endrolt où se cachent les renards et les loups,
The place where the foxes and wolves hide themselves.

These are very common expressions with the French, who make wonderful use of this se, and especially with the verb trouver (to find), which they make use of instead of être, in innumerable instances; as:

I am very well, How is he now? We are very well here, Je me trouve fort bien. Comment se trouve-t-il maintenant. Nous nous trouvons blen ici.

- 43. The printer who likes the people so much.
- 44. I plant lettuces and celery.
- 45. Give me some of both, if you please.
- 387. THE TIMES. You have just seen enough (for you have just been reading the Etymology of Verbs) of the reason for there being changes in the form of the verb to denote different times. You have seen enough also, and, I hope, know enough, of the manner of making those changes. You have now to learn when one of the TIMES is to be used, and when another; for, as you have seen, there are two past times in French: and besides this, the French do not, in all cases, use their times so as to answer to the corresponding times in English.
- 388. Time is, and must be, present, past, or future. To express the present, we, in English, have three forms; as,

I find,
I do find,
I am finding,

} je trouve,

The French have only this one form to answer to the whole of the three. We, from our infancy, learn to distinguish with the greatest nicety the import of one of our forms from that of either of the other two; but, in the present case, we are happy in having to do with a language which has but one present time at any rate:

I am writing a letter,
Indeed I do write letters every day,
I write to my friends very often,

J'écris une lettre.
En vérité j'écris des lettres tous les jours.
J'écris fort souvent à mes amis.

It is, you see, always écris. This is very easy, then? Yes, much too easy to last long. Every blockhead would learn French, if all were as easy as this.

389. The French have two past times. We have, in our past time, the do and the ing; that is to say, the do become did, and, in the above example, the am become was; as, I was writing; I did write; I wrote. Ay, but the French have two distinct sets of words to express the past by. Look now again, for a moment, at the conjugation of Trouver, in paragraph 118. There you see, that, in what they call the past imperfect time, I found, is, je trouvais, and, in the past perfect time, I found, is, je trouvai. In the other persons of the verb, the change is greater: so great indeed as for the words to appear not to belong at all to one another. Nous Trouvins is the past imperfect, and nous Trouvâmes the past perfect. Now, mind, each of these means we found.

390. Well, but as they mean the same thing, cannot they be used indifferently? Indeed they cannot; for, though we express them, in English, by the same word, they have a meaning, in French, clearly distinct from each other. To know when one of them is to be employed, and when the other, attend very earnestly to what I am now going to say. But, first of all, let me, in an extract from a French history, show you how these two past times are used. I shall give the translation. It is an account of an explosion in the fortified town of VERDUN in France:

Le 18 Novembre, 1727, le On the 18th November, 4727, licues à la ronde. There eut aussi des marques de la vio- were also marks of the violence of magés considérablement, ainsi quo siderably damaged, as well as the l'hôpital général, et celui des sol- general hospital, and that of the plies. La quantité de pondre, qui ing Prayers. The quantity of prit fen, consistait en quatre milliers powder that took fire consisted of de poudre fine, et six milliers de four thousand weight of fine, and six thousand weight of common.

391. The verbs, you will perceive, are put in Italic characters. We will, when we have laid down the rules, see how the use of the verbs agrees with those rules. Monsieur Restaut has the following passage upon this subject. I shall translate it entire; because it will be useful as the groundwork of my observations, and because it will enable us to see how the above practice squares with the rules of this able grammarian.

392. Monsieur Restaut says: "The prétérit (past " perfect) time points out a thing passed, and passed, "too, in a time no part of which remains, and in " which we no longer are; as, je fus malade l'année " DERNIÈRE. It is essential to observe, that we ought " not to make use of this past time to denote any time " which is not further back than the day in which we "are talking. So that we must not say, JE FUS " MALADE CE MATIN. We must say, J'AI ÉTÉ malade "ce matin. Also, we must not use the past perfect in " speaking of this year, this century; nor of any time, "any part of which remains yet to pass away." To this he adds, that "the past perfect time must, on no "account, be employed except as applied to a time " absolutely completely passed; whereas, there are many " eases in which it is not a fault to use, instead of the "past perfect, the compound of the present; as, " Alexandre fut le plus grand capitaine de son siècle: " or, Alexandre a été le plus grand capitaine de son " siècle."

393. Now, how does this agree with the above passage? Read that passage attentively, and look at, and compare with one another, the several verbs in it. It is very true that the year 1727 is wholly gone and past; that no part of it remains; that we are no longer in it. Therefore it is very right, of course, to say,

This is all very right, and according to the rules of Monsieur Restaut, who has said, as I have just quoted, and who says, with regard to the imperfect, that it is to be used to denote the past with regard to the present; and that it designates that a thing was present in a time that is now past; as, "I WAS at "table when you came. My being at table is now "past, but this manner of using the verb points out, "that it was present when you arrived."

394. So far all is very well; and it is easy enough for you to know one case when the imperfect ought to be used; namely, when we use the active participle and the verb to be in the past time; I was at table, that is, sitting at table, when you arrived. Thus you see very elearly why "fesait seeher" was put, instead of fit seeher, in the first sentence of the above extract; for this is the translation:

Uu ouvrier qui fesait sceher de la poudre dans une poüle, A workman who was drying some powder in a frying-pan.

Here is the active participle and the past time of the verb to be. But in the last sentence of this passage there is the verb consistait. You cannot say, was consisting. How will Monsieur Restaut here make out something that was present when another thing happened, which other thing is now passed also? But, stop; here is another verb in the same sentence, and in the past perfect too. "La quantité de poudre, qui "prit feu, consistait en quatre milliers de poudre fine." Why, then, I ask, have we prit instead of prenait? Or, why have we consistait instead of consista? You cannot turn consistait into was consisting, any more than you can turn prit feu into was taking fire. time, observe, is quite past. It is entirely gone. We are no longer in it. The verb consistait cannot be turned into was consisting; and yet it is in the imperfect time.

395. The rules are, then, defective, The instructions are not clear. The distinctions are obscurely stated. First, it is clear enough that the imperfect, or (which is a much better word) the unfinished form of the French verb, must always be used when we can turn the phrase into English by the active participle and the verb to be; when we can turn it into English by the verb and our word used; or, when we can turn it into English by the help of any word, signifying the habit of doing or being; as:

I was planting peas yesterday, when. I wrote to him every week,
I was in the habit of going thither,
They continued there for six years,
I used to eat a good deal of sugar, je plantais des pois hier, quand... je lui écrivais toutes les semaines. j'avais contune d'y aller. ils y restaient pendant six ans. je mangeais beaucoup de sucre.

But when you can discover none of these English marks of a demand for the imperfect, or unfinished, form of the verb, observe this; that we sometimes make use of the past time of the verb, without having any intention to mark any time at all; but to point out a fact; a fact, indeed, relating to a past time, but the time being, nevertheless, of no importance; as:

The Jews were a wicked race; les Juis étaient une méchante race; they were seditious and avaricious, lis étaient séditioux et avares.

on to be, a bad race of people; but here is nothing finished, nothing brought to a close; and that, mind, is necessary to justify the use of the past perfect time.

396. Look again at the above quoted passage, and at the sentence before the last. There are two verbs in that sentence, the first in the past perfect, the last in the past imper/ect. "Les dames de la Congréga-"tion furent les plus maltraitées, leurs dortoirs ayant "été renversés pendant qu'elles étaient à Complics." Here are furent and étaient in the same sentence, and applying to the same persons. But if you look well into the matter, the reason is as clear as daylight. Furent relates to a matter done with, finished, completely over, and that, too, in a past time. But in that same past time the ladies were at their Complies, or Evening Prayers; elles étaient à Complies: their dormitories were demolished while they were at Prayers. The prayers were, in the time spoken of, going on; but the dormitories were done for: the misfortune of the ladies was over.

397. Let us take another instance. "SEDAN (a "town of France) était autrefois une petite Souve"raineté, de laquelle dépendaient dix-sept villages.
"Elle appartenait anciennement aux archevêques de 'Rheims, un desquels l'échangea avec le Roi pour "Cormicy." Now, you see, était autrefois, and appartenait and dépendaient all include the idea of continuation. This little district was formerly a lordship. We might say, that it used to be a lordship. We might also say, that the villages used to depend upon it, and that it used to belong to the archbishops of Rheims. But (and now mind) we could not say that one of these bishops used to exchange it with the king. That was an act done, finished, not going on; not spoken of as being (in the past time alluded to) in a state of being continued.

398. Now the matter clears up. We begin to see the reason for this distinction in the past time; for, if you can, by a change in the ending of the verb, discover at once whether an act was finished or was going on, at a certain time, it is a great advantage. You can now see, I think, the reason for employing consistait, as mentioned in paragraph 394, and also for using prit in the same sentence. "La poudre, qui prit feu, " consistait en quatre milliers." Why not, said I, put consista as well as prit? You could now, I hope, tell me why: namely, because the taking of fire was a thing done with. The fire took, the mill blew up, and there was an end. The matter was finished in the past time alluded to. But, mind, the powder's consisting of such a quantity was a matter without any limit as to time. It had consisted for some time; its consisting had been going on. There had been continuation in it; and, therefore, the writer could not say consista. Take two more instances, and then, I think, I may leave this matter:

Il l'aimait long-temps, et à la ûn il l'épousa,

Hier, qui était dimanche, il alla à l'église,

He loved her for a long time, and at last he married her. Yesterday, which was Sunday, he Yesterday, which was Sunday, he went to church.

Here, you see again, there is continuation in the loving and in the Sunday; but none in the act of marrying nor in that of going to church. But,

Elle l'accosta comme il allait à She accosted him as he was going l'église, to church.

Here, you see, the case is different. His going to church is here spoken of as a thing that was going on at the time alluded to; a thing that was, in that time, in a state of continuation.

- 399. Thus have I, I think, made this matter clear. However, it is, observe, one of the great difficulties of the French language; and it is one which the makers of grammars have taken special care to slide by without seareely touching it. In grammars written for French people, to go into the matter thus minutely is not necessary, because they are, from their infancy, in the habit of making use of these words in their two forms. But without explanation, and clear explanation too, how are we to know when he had is to be'il avait, and when it is to be il eut?
- 400. Having now done with these two Times, lct us speak a little of the rest. We have seen in the rule of Monsieur Restaut, that the compound of the present time may be frequently used instead of the past perfect time; and this is very commou; as:

We do not make use of this manner of expression in English. We do not say, she has sung last night. We say, she sang last night.

401. As to the FUTURE TIME, it has, in the Etymology, been explained to you, that our will and shall, which help to form the future time of our verbs, are wholly unknown in the French language, which, with more elegance and ease, and with less equivocation, expresses, by a change in the ending of the verb itself, all that we express, and that we wish to express, by the use of these nasty little harsh-sounding words.

Foreigners have great difficulty in learning when they ought to use will and when shall. Those who learn French have no such difficulty.

I shall put my hand in my pocket, le will put my hand in my pocket, je mettrai la main dans ma poche.

And thus it is always. If, however, shall is used to denote obligation, and will to denote determination, they must be answered in another way, as we shall see by-and-by; but, as far as simply declaring or stating goes, the above is the manner of rendering the English future into French.

402. I have said, and well I may, that time must be present, past, or future; yet some grammarians have contrived to find, in French and English, a great many more times than three; or, at least, states of the verb which they call times. It may, in some languages, be necessary to make those numerous distinctions under the name of times. In French and English it is not only unnecessary, but it produces great confusion, and tends greatly to bewilder and disgust the learner, whether of English or of French. I will give you an instance of this, and will keep to our old verb Trouver.

je trouve, je trouvais, je trouvai, je trouverai,	present,	i	I find.
	past imperfect, past perfect, future,	}	I found,
			I shall find.

j'ai trouvé,
j'avais trouvé,
j'eus trouvé,
j'eus trouvé,
j'aurai trouvé,
the past perfect anterior,
j'aurai trouvé,
the future anterior,
I shall have found.

It is in the grammar of Monsieur de Lévizac that I find these pretty names given to times. The two forms for the past times are, as we have seen, necessary in French, and they must, of course, have two names. But of what use are the four names here placed under the line? What are these times, after all, more than those above the line? Above the line, you have the changes in trouver to mark the four times; and below the line, you have the changes in avoir to mark the same four times. If, indeed, trouver changed its form here eight times instead of four, it would be necessary to have eight names to distinguish them by. But, as it is, the four additional names only serve to puzzle, retard, and disgust the scholar.

403. In paragraphs from 125 to 128 I have fully explained the offices of Avoir and Etre, as auxiliary verbs. When they are used with the verb, the several times are said to be compound, which they are, because they consist of more than one thing: thus, I have found is the compound of the present time; because have belongs to one verb, and found to another. Why, then, not call these times the compound of the present, of the past, and of the future?

I have found, I had found, I shall have found, j'ai trouvé. j'avais, or j'eus trouvé. j'aurai trouvé.

It is, you see, the verb to have, used in all its times with the passive participle of the principal verb (trouver) coming after it. It is, in fact, a mere conjugation of the verb to have, with that participle always coming after it.

404. But, as you have seen in paragraph 132, the compound times are formed with être, and not with avoir, when the verb is reflected. And observe also, that êtê, the passive participle of être, is, as in English, sometimes, and very frequently, used along with avoir and the passive participle of the principal verb; as, j'ai été trouvé, I have been found. This may be called the compound of the passive; that is all. The verb avoir is conjugated throughout all its times, and the two passive participles come after it. Now, let us see an instance of each of these that I have been speaking of in the three foregoing paragraphs.

I find, je trouvais, or trouvai. I found. I shall find. je trouverai. j'ai trouvé. I have found, j'avais, or j'eus, trouvé. I had found. I shall have found. j'aurai trouve. j'ai été trouvé. I have been found. j'avais, or j'eus été trouvé. I had been found. I shall have been found. i'aurai été trouvé.

405. As to the times of the Subjunctive Mode, all that has here been said holds good with regard to them. Time is always present, past, or future; and there can be no need of imagining other times, and giving names to them. When the times are compound; that is to say, when avoir, or (in reflected verbs) être, comes into use, you are to take it, and conjugate it instead of the principal verb, the passive participle of which you are to add all the way through, as you see it done in the six last of the nine examples just given you. But, mind, you are to conjugate the compound times with être, instead of avoir, in a few neuter verbs, as well as in all the reflected verbs. These neuter verbs are, accourir, aller, aborder, arriver, choir, décéder, descendre, devenir, entrer, monter, mourir, naître, partir, passer. rester, retourner, revenir, sortir, tomber, venir. you must say, je suis entré dans la chambre, and not j'ai entré dans la chambre.

Note.—Some verbs of this last-mentioned class are either active or neuter, according to the sense in which they are used, like some English verbs; and even when only neuter, some of them may be used in one sense with être but in another with avoir: as,

Il était sorti, J'ai sorti des marchandises. Le printemps sera bientôt passé, Nous avions passé deux heures Wo had passed two hours in à lire, Elle est descendue de la chambre.

Elle a descendu l'escalier.

He had gone out, or was from home. I have sent out some goods. The spring will soon have passed.

reading. She has gone down from the room. She has come down the stairs.

It is easy to perceive that where être is thus used the participle of the other verb is often an adjective, agreeing in gender and number with the noun or pronoun, as with the above Elle est descendue. And so, again, it would be with passer:

La procession est passée, Les processions sont passées,

The procession has gone by. The processions have gone by.]

406. I shall conclude my remarks on the times of verbs by noticing some little peculiarities in the use of the French times. I have already noticed, that, in French, the compound of the present is very frequently employed instead of the past perfect; and even instead of the future; as:

Je dinai chez lui hier. J'ai diné chez lui hier. Avez-vous bientôt fini?

I dined with him yesterday.

will you soon have done?

We cannot choose thus in English. We canuot say, I have dined with him yesterday. When we make use of the compound of the present, it must relate to some portion of time not completely passed. The French may say, la récolte fut bonne l'année dernière, or a été bonne [and the latter is the most common]; but we must say, the crop was good. But, on the other hand, we can apply the past time to a period not ended; as, she was here this morning; whereas, as we have seen, the French cannot apply their past time to a period not ended.

407. When there is no time at all specified or cared about, we can, in both languages, make use of the compound of the present; as:

We have seen evil enough, | Nous arons vu assez de mal. The reason is, that in our lives, in our time, in our day, or something denoting a period not passed, is understood; as, he has read much, il a lu beaucoup: but in this respect the two languages are very nearly alike.

408. There is one thing more to point out, but it is of importance. The French frequently make use of the present of the verb être instead of the compound of avoir and être.

Il y a un mois que le vent est à l'Est, Elle est depuis plus d'un mois hors de chez elle. Il y a plus d'un an que je suis malade, Je suis depuis dix jours en route. It is a month that the wind is in the East.

She is more than a month from home.

It is more than a year that 1 am sick.

I am ten days on my journey.

This is a word-for-word translation, as nearly as I can well make it. Now, we never express ourselves thus: we say,

The wind has been in the East for a month. She has been more than a month from home. I have been sick more than a year. I have been ten days on my journey.

The French may use the same form, and they frequently do: as, Il y a un mois que le vent a été à l'Est; j'ai été malade il y a plus d'un an.

[Note.—As to the two past times of the verb, in the compound form, there is a pretty certain rule by which to use the one or the other. Neither can be used without our having in view two eireumstances, of action or occurrence, each having reference to the other in point of time. And therefore it is that these forms of the verb are almost always accompanied by. an adverb or conjunction denoting a point of time, such as quand, lorsque, pas plus tôt, dès que, aussitôt que, à peine que, après que. The rule is, that if what you express in the compound form is that which it is your principal object to say, the compound must be that of the past imperfect; and if, on the contrary, the expression with the compound is but as an incident to, or merely bearing a relation, in the way of time, to your main subject, then it must be the past perfect. For example:

J'avais trouvé le mouton quand vous êtes arrivé, Au sitôt que je l'eus trouvé, je m'en allai. I had found the sheep when you arrived.

As soon as I had found it, I went away.

In the first instance, the finding of the sheep is the main thing. to be told, and the arrival is mentioned only as an incidental occurrence. In the second, the going away is the principal subject spoken of, and the finding is but the incident, with reference to the time of which the going has occurred. Observation in reading French will show this to be the rule. And it applies, of course, to the auxiliaries, avoir and être, in distinguishing their two compounds, j'avais en and j'eus eu, j'avais été and j'eus été.——There is another compound of the past which Grammarians speak of as rarely employed. We find it, however, in practice. It is formed by the compound of the auxiliary avoir, in its present, past imperfect, or past perfect time, together with the participle passive of the principal verb. Thus, instead of j'ai trouvé, j'avais trouvé, j'eus trouvé, the French sometimes say j'ai eu trouvé, j'avais eu trouvé, j'eus eu trouvé; and so on.]

- 16. They rise early.
- 17. We rose every morning at four o'clock.
- 18. You ought to rise much earlier than you do.
- 409. THE MODES. Now, though you, at the beginning of this Letter; that is to say, at the beginning of your study of the Syntax of Verbs; though you read throughout the Etymology of verbs, yet these Modes are a matter of so much importance that you must once more read paragraphs 116 and 117; and read them, too, with very great attention.
- 410. As I have there observed, the modes would be a matter of less consequence if the French verbs did not change their form in order to accommodate themselves to the different modes, or, at least, if this were not so frequently the case; but, as you will find, it is almost always the ease. In English we say, I make, I must make; but in French we must say, je fais, il faut que je fasse. Ours is make in both cases; but in French it is fais in one case and fasse in the other. If you were, in translating I make, to say, je fasse; or, in translating I must make, to say, il faut que je fais, French people would hardly understand you; they might guess at your meaning, but that would be all. They would not laugh outright at you, as we generally do at the French people when they speak broken English, but they would laugh to themselves. is, then, an affair of great consequence.

- 411. You have just read (in paragraph 116) a description of the four Modes. I need not, if you have read that paragraph and the next, describe those modes again. What I have now to do is, to teach you when the one is employed and when the other. The Infinitive, as being the root of the verb, stands first in the conjugations; but I shall speak of it last. I shall take the other three in their due order; the Indicative, the Subjunctive, and the Imperative.
- 412. But before I speak of the manner of using these modes, let me again caution you not to look upon the signs of our verbs, as you see them placed in the conjugations: let me caution you not to look upon those signs, I mean should, could, would, may, and might, as being to be translated upon all occasions as you see them translated in the conjugations. I have, indeed, in these conjugations, put only shall, may, should, and might, for want of room for the others. The danger is, that, seeing should, for instance, placed against a certain time in a certain mode, you will conclude, that our should must always be translated in that manner. That is not the ease; and, therefore, you must take eare not to adopt this notion of the matter. It was necessary to place some signs before our verbs in the eonjugations: those which I have there placed do, in certain cases, answer, with their verb, to the verb against which they are placed; but, mind, they do not thus answer in all cases; and this you must take eare not to forget.
- 413. We are to begin now with the Indicative Mode. As you have before been told, it simply indicates or declares, as its name imports. It does not express an action or state of being, which is dependent on any other action or state of being. It is the unconditional state of the verb, affirming or denying, without, as our saying is, "any of your if; and ands;" as:

I go to London, je vais à Londres.
I do not go to London, je ne vais pas à Londres.

These verbs are in the indicative: but, if there be a dependence, a condition, a something subjoined, the verb is in the subjunctive; as:

Il importe que j'aille à Londres, it is of consequence for me to go to London.

Il importe que je n'aille pas à it is of consequence for me not to Londres, go to London.

Here, you sec, is a consequence attached to the thing expressed by the verb. There is something subjoined, or joined on, to the simple act of going, or not going, to Accordingly, you see that the verb changes its form. Aller (to go) is, you know, an irregular verb. Look at the conjugation of it in paragraph 203. You there see that vais is the first person singular of the indicative, and that aille is the first person singular of the subjunctive. There are, perhaps, a hundred words in the indicative for one in the subjunctive. The Infinitive is attended with little difficulty, and the Imperative with less. The great thing, then, as to the modes, is to know when we ought to put the verb in the subjunctive. The indicative may be said to be the rule, and the subjunctive the exception. The exception is, however, very extensive; but there are rules relating to it, and those rules we are now going to see. In English we have no change, or very little, in the form of the verb, to distinguish the subjunctive from the indicative; but, if we had, the guide would not be perfect: for it is not always that a French verb in the subjunctive is properly translated by an English verb in the same mode.

414. The Subjunctive must always be used after certain conjunctions, which are said to govern that - mode. But, first of all, it is best to seek for some principle: for, even if we fall short of perfection in principle, the very effort does something for us. We have seen that the subjunctive is used where there is dependence on some other act or state of being. also used generally when passion, desire, or strong feeling is expressed; as, je veux qu'il s'en aille, I wish him to go away; or, literally, I will that he himself from this go. Verbs also denoting joy, sorrow, doubt, fear, suspicion, permission, and prohibition, take the subjunctive. The verb permettre, for instance, causes the one that follows it to be in the subjunctive: as, "permettez que je vous le dise," "permit me to tell it "you." If this last verb, dire, tell, were in the indicative, it would be dis; but, being in the subjunctive, it is dise. Now, observe:

Vous savez que je le dis, Vous permettez que je le diss, Vous jurez qu'elle le fait, Vous désirez qu'elle le fasse.

you know that I say it.
you permit me to say it.
you swear that she does it.
you desire that she may do it.

Here, you see, are dis and dise, fait and fasse, only because savez and jurez govern the indicative, and permettez and désirez the subjunctive. You see, too, that there is a twisting in our English; we do not say after permit and desire what we say after know and swear. After desire we have a real subjunctive; may do.

415. A dictionary explaining the governing of the subjunctive should be resorted to here. When you are going to use a verb (until you know them all), look to see whether it govern the subjunctive. If it do, the verb which it so governs must be put in the subjunctive mode.

- 416. The subjunctive mode has, in almost every instance, que before it. Sometimes it has qui, but not often. However, the use of these words is not confined to this mode by any means; so that you are not to suppose that a verb is in the subjunctive merely because it may have que or qui before it.
- 417. The French subjunctive in the present time, is very often used to answer to the English future of the indicative; as:

Craignez-vous qu'elle ne meure?
Croyez-vous qu'elle le fasse?
Pensez-vous qu'il vieune?
Do ye

Do you fear that she will die? Do you believe that she will do it? Do you think that he will come?

A great deal of attention and a great deal of writing, will very soon put you in possession of a knowledge of this matter. You see that there is, in all these cases, more or less of uncertainty, of doubt, of tear, of something creating a dependence of one verb upon the other. After all, there must, as to the examples just given, be something left to be acquired by experience, by the habit of reading, writing, and speaking; for while you may say, and indeed must say, "croyez-vous qu'elle le "fasse," you must, if the first verb be in any time but the present or the future of the indicative, put the second verb in the past perfect of the subjunctive; as:

Croylèz-vous qu'elle le f'it, | Did you think that she did it.

.) Croyiez-vous qu'elle le fasse.

Because croyiez is not in the present, nor in the future, of the indicative. There are certain pronouns and conjunctions which, with que after them, govern the subjunctive mode. The pronouns are quelque, quoique, and quels-que, when these words bear the sense of whatsoever, whatever, or however. This mode is also used after si, when si means so, or so much of; or when si has any such comparative meaning, and when it is followed by que. Also after quoique, although.

Quelque riches qu'elles soyent, Quoique vons oper riche, Quels que soyent les voyagents, Quelques arbres qu'en paisse avoir, Quelque vieille qu'elle fât, Quoi qu'il en soit, Quoi qu'en en dies, il en mourra, Si vous y allez et que vous y restiez, Elle u'est pas si prudente qu'elle ne fasse jamais de fante, Ils n'étaient pas si cénéreux qu'ils donnussent tout leur bien, However rich they may be.
Though you may be rich.
Whoever the travellers may be.
Whatever trees they may have.
However old she might be.
However old she might be.
However it may be; or be it as it may.
Whatever his sister might be. for it.

They were not so generous that they gave all their property.

418. There are certain Adjectives which, with ilest (impersonal) before them, require the subjunctive mode after them; or, as it is called, they govern the subjunctive mode. I do not like to insert lists of words: it is the business of the Dictionary to do that. But as the Dictionary does not always place against these Adjectives the fact that they, with ilest before them, govern the subjunctive, I shall insert these Adjectives here. They are as follows:

agréable, ai-é, ai-é, ailligeant, à propos, bieus éant, beau, chagrinant, cruel, expédient, dangereux, difficile, divertissant, doux, douvertissant, dur, disgracienx, ennuyenx, ennuyenx, facile, fācheux, glorieux, gracieux, heureux, hontenx, importaut, impossible, indifférent, injuste, juste,

juste,
malheureux,
mal-aisé,
micux (with vaut before i!), nortifiant,
nécessaire, possible,
plaisant, sensible,
surprenant, triste,
vilain,

These must have the il est before them to make them require the subjunctive after them. Some of them may always have c'est instead of il est; for you may say, il est impossible qu'il aille; or, c'est impossible; but, at any rate, you can always use c'est if you employ the word chose; as:

It is possible that that may be,

When I say, the Impersonal il est, I mean il with some part of the verb être. It may be il est, or il était, or il scra, as we have seen in the Letter on Impersonal Verbs. [See paragraph 357.] You know this already, but it is not amiss to remind you of it. We, in English, do not use this manner of expression, except with some of these adjectives; or, rather, with our own adjectives that answer to these. We say, "it is "possible that that may be;" but we do not say, "it is "shameful that that may be." In this case we may say should be. It is therefore necessary to attend to the above rule. Write this list of adjectives down ten or twenty times, and you will seldom forget them afterwards. To fix a thing well in the memory, there is nothing equal to the putting of it into writing.

419. But, besides these Adjectives, there are certain nouns and conjunctions which also govern the subjunctive mode. They, like the Adjectives, all have a meaning that makes us perceive, that there is a dependence of one act, or state of being, on another act, or state of being. The nouns are: bienscance, necessité. These take the il est also; and they take the article; d'une nécessité, de la bienséance. Then there are moyen, honneur, déshonneur, honte, gloire, with the article before them preceded by il y a; as, "il n'y a pus moyen qu'elle sasse cela."

420. You have seen instances enough, already, of il faut requiring the subjunctive mode. Importer is a verb which means to signify, or to be of consequence, or, as we say sometimes, to matter. To signify is, in French, signifier; but they do not use this verb very often to answer to our signify. They do not employ it commonly to express mattering, or being of consequence. They use the verb faire, in some cases, and the verb importer, in others; and in this case importer requires the subjunctive after it; as, "il importait "qu'ils le fissent," and not "qu'ils le firent."

11 importo que vous soyez sobre, Il importe que nous ayons du pain, it is of consequence that you should be sober.
it is of consequence that we should have bread

This verb importer, when used with il before it, is of great use in French. No expression in the whole language is more eommon than N'importe; and this answers to our no matter. This word importer is, mind, a verb which is used in all its times, like another verb; but we are now speaking of it in its capacity of impersonal, used with que after it, and governing the subjunctive mode:

Il importe qu'elle rienne,
Il n'importait pas qu'ils vinssent,
Importe-t-il qu'il aille!
Il n'importe pas que nous allions, Qu'importe cela?
Qu'est-ce que cela fait!

it is of consequence that she should come.

it was of no consequence whether they came or not.
is it of any consequence whether he go or no?

it is of no consequence whether we go of what consequence is that? or, what matters that? or, what signifies that?

These two last examples do not belong, properly, to our present subject, because they do not include a subjunctive; but having this word importer in hand, and knowing how much it is in use, it was right to dwell thus upon it. The phrases, of no consequence, do not signify, is no matter, what signifies? are, as you know, of very common use in English. Those phrases which answer to them must, of course, be of very common use in French; and, therefore, it is of great importance, it is absolutely necessary, for you to learn how these phrases are expressed in French. The French have, as well as we, the nouns consequence and matter, and the verb to signify; and they write them thus: conséquence, matière, signifier. We are, therefore, apt (and indeed we always do it till we learn better) to use the words consequence, matter, and signify, in French, in these cases; and this is a very great error. A few examples will make this matter plain to you; and will, I hope, prevent you from making, in such cases, literal translations of the English into French:

That is of no consequence, That does not signify, That is no matter, What does that signify? cela n'est de point de conséquence. cela ne signifie pas. cela n'est point de matière, qu'est ce que cela signifie ?

This is a literal translation as nearly as possible; and a Frenchman would certainly not comprehend you. He might guess at the meaning, but that would be all. The fourth French phrase is, indeed, good French; but it does not mean what it is here intended to mean. The French verb signifier, though it sometimes answers to our verb signify, does not answer to it in this sense. In English signify has two meanings; one is to mean, and the other to be of consquence; and it is not used in this latter sense in French; therefore, "Qu'est ce que cela signifie?" means, what does that mean? and not, what does that signify? Now, then, let us sec:

That is of no consequence, That does not signify, That is no matter, Does it signify? Does it much matter? That did not signify much, Cela n'est d'aucune conséquence. N'importe. Cela n'est d'aucune importance. Importe-t-il? Importe-t-il beaucoup? Cela n'importait pas beaucoup. Qu'est-c: que cela fait?

Qa'importe?

What does that signify?

Observe, that the verb faire (which is a great actor in French), may, in many such cases, be used instead of importer; as, "ecla ne fait rien." There are some little differences in the use of the two, but faire is more familiar than importer. But, mind (and this brings us back to our subject), il fait does not govern the subjunctive; nor is the verb faire one of those which require the subjunctive after it.

421. The verb convenie, when it is used as an impersonal, requires the subjunctive after it. This verb means to fit, to suit, to become, in short, to be convenient. It is a verb of great use, as ours are which answer to it:

It's fitting for that to be done, It suits for him to go, It becomes them to be charitable, il convlent que cela soit fait.

il convlent qu'il aille.
il convient qu'ils soient charitables.

You see, here, that we, after our fitting, suits, and becomes, use our infinitives, to be and to go. The same may be done in French, when there is a noun or pronoun the actor in the phrase; as:

It suits him to go thither, il lui convient d'y aller.
It becomes them to be charitable, il leur convient d'être charitables.

When, however, one of these forms ought to be used, and when the other, can be taught only by practice; but you have the consolation to know that constant practice, diligent use of the pen, will very soon teach it:

There are no means of my going thither, {Il n'y a pas groyen que j'y nille. Je n'ai pas le moyen d'y aller. 422. The Conjunctions, mentioned at the beginning of paragraph 419, as governing the subjunctive mode, are thirty-eight in number, and are these which follow:

afin que, loin que, avant que, malgré que. à la bonne heure que, moyennant que, au cas que, non que, à moins que, non pas que, à condition que. nonobstant que, à Dieu ne plaise que, pour que, posez le cas que, bien que, bien entendu ane. ' pourvu que, bien loin que, pour peu que, plaise, or plut, à Dieu que, ce n'est pas que, de peur que, auoiaue. de crainte que, sans que, Dieu veuille que, soit que, supposé que, encore que, en cas que, jusqu' à ce que, excepté que, si ce n'est que, hormis que, si tant est que, hors que, taut s'en faut que.

There are some Conjunctions which govern the indicative mode, and some that govern the infinitive; but if you place the above list well in your memory, you will very soon cease to confound the modes, as far as they are governed by Conjunctions. The Conjunctions that govern the subjunctive have always que after them; but as there are some Conjunctions which have que after them, and which govern the indicative mode, mistakes will happen if you do not take great care.

An cas qu'il aille, Aussitôt qu'il va,
A moins que nons soyons,
Dès que nous serons,

For instance:

in case he go. as soon as he goes. except that we may be. as soon as we shall be.

You see, here, that the two Conjunctions that I have taken from the above list have the verbs in the subjunctive mode. Look at the conjugation of aller and of être. The act, in the first of the two examples, is to go. The actor is the third person in both instances: yet, in one case, the verb is aille, and in the other it is va; and this is only because one of the verbs has au cas que before it, and the other aussitôt que. It would be useless to give a list of the conjunctions which govern the indicative; because all the conjunctions which govern the subjunctive have que, and all which have que before them, and which are not in the above list of thirty-eight, govern the indicative. Fix, therefore, the above thirty-eight well in your memory; or, rather, make them familiar to your eye, and you will never make mistakes respecting them. Let us take a few examples relating to those conjunctions and their government of modes:

Suppose that they did it, Provided that they did it, Unless they did it, Not that they did it,

When they did it, Even as they did it, Because they did it, Besides that they did it, The moment they did it, supposez qu'ils le fissent. pourvu qu'ils le fissent. à moins qu'ils le fissent. non qu'ils le fissent.

lorsqu'ils le faisaient, or firent, de même qu'ils le faisaient. à cause qu'ils le faisaient. outre qu'ils le faisaient. au moment qu'ils le faisaient.

Thus, you see, while it is always did in English, it is, in French, fissent above the line, and fuisaient under the line. This difference is occasioned solely by the conjunctions. There is, you see, a very striking difference between the form of the one and that of the other; and the sound is very different also. It might have been firent instead of fuisaient, the one being, as you know, the perfect, and the other the imperfect of the indicative; but neither bears much resemblance to fissent. It is, then, of great importance to have well fixed in your mind the conjunctions that require, or govern, the subjunctive: there are but thirty-eight of Write them over and over until they become very familiar to your eye; and then you will have only to bear in mind, that all other conjunctions followed by que govern the indicative; and that these thirty-eight are all the conjunctions that govern the subjunctive.

423. The subjunctive is used after qui, when qui comes after an adjective in the superlative degree, or after a negative; as:

Le plus joli jardin qu'il y ait dans ce The prettlest garden that there is in pays la. that country.

and not

Le plus joli jardin qu'il y a dans ce pays-là.

It is the qui, perceive, coming after le plus, that demands the subjunctive of the verb. If there were no qui, or if there were qui without the le plus, the indicative would be used. Let us take an example of the three:

La plus jolie fille qu'il y ait dans cette La plus jolie fille est dans cette ville, La jolie fille qui est dans cette ville, the prettlest girl that there is in this the prettiest girl is in this town. the pretty girl that is in this town.

It is, you perceive, the superlative and the qui together that require the subjunctive to follow. Not only qui. however, but any other relative pronoun proceeding from qui, if such relative come between verbs expressing desire or necessity. But first let us take an example of the effect which the negative has upon the mode in this case:

Il n'y a pas d'homme qui soit plus esthuć que lni,

Il y a mi homme qui est plus estimé que lui,

Je ne vois pas de fleurs qui soient plus belles que celles-là, those. Je tois des fleurs qui sont plus belles I see flowers which are more gay than que celles-ci, these.

These examples make the matter plain so far. show you, that it is the negative which requires the

there is no man who is more esteemed than he.

.llieve is a man who is more esteemed than he.

I see no flowers which are finer than subjunctive, and which causes you to have, in the first example, soit, while in the second you have est, though both are in the present time, and both in the third person singular, and though both are translated into Euglish by is. The same remark applies to the third and fourth examples, except that they are in the plural instead of the singular. Here you have soient in one ease and sont in the other, though both are translated into English by are. But, as I noticed above, any relative pronoun proceeding from qui, if such relative come between two verbs, and if it relate to a person or thing that is desired, wanted, or wished for, requires the subjunctive; as:

I want a servant who is industrious,

Find me a house that is large and convenient,

I wish to have a meadow that you think good, and that is to be sold, il me faut un domestique qui soit laborieux. tronvez-mol une muison qui soit grande et commode. Je veux un pré que vous trouviez bon, et qui soit à vendre.

However, if qui or que do not relate to a person or thing that is desired, wanted, or wished for, then the subjunctive is not used; as, "je n'aime pas uu domes"tique qui fait sou devoir à contre-cœur," "I do not "like a servant who does his duty unwillingly." But let us take an example or two more:

1 want a garden which is well situated, j'al besoin d' (or, je veux) un jardin qui soit hien situé

He has a garden which is full of weeds, R a un jardin qui e-t plein de mauvaises herbes.

Tell me, said she, of a husband who is particle moi, dit-elle, d'un mari qui sont young and handsome, and rich at the same time, I desusse a man who is nothing but rich, je méprise l'homme qui n'est que riche.

You see, when the qui or que, that is, the who or whom, or which, relates to a person or thing that is desired or wished for, or for the having of which, or the existing of which, there is necessity, want, or need; then the verb that follows must be in the subjunctive; otherwise not. This is, I think, made quite elear by the above examples.

424. It now remains for me to speak, as far as the subjunctive mode is concerned, of the different times of the subjunctive. There is a present, a past imperfect, and a past perfect. Now, mark: when the verb which goes before the subjunctive is in the present or in the future of the indicative, then the present time of the subjunctive must be used; as:

Je désire qu'il vienne, Je désirerai qu'il vienne, I desire that he may come.

I shall desire that he may come.

But when the governing verb is in any time other than the present or the future of the indicative, then the subjunctive verb must be in the past perfect; as:

Je désirais qu'il vînt, Je désirai qu'il vînt, J'ai désiré qu'il vînt, J'avais désiré qu'il vînt, I desired that he might come.
I desired that he might come.
I have desired that he might come.
I had desired that he might come.

You see it is vienne after the present and the future of the indicative, and vînt after the past times and after the compound times.

425. We have might come in these examples; but it is not always that this translation takes place. In the conjugations you find you may be put against vous soyez. But though you may be is, in some cases, the translation of vous soyez, it is far indeed from being always such: now mind, for this is a very important matter. We have good use for one of our subjunctives here, in order to say, "il importe que vous fassiez la "plus grande attention à ce que je dis," that is, "it is "of consequence that you should pay the greatest "attention to what I am saying."

Il désire que vous soyezpuni, Il convient que vous soyez puni, he desires that you may be punished. it is proper that you should be punished.

That is enough! Here is soyez translated by may be, and in the next line by should be. Some grammarians say, that should does not belong to the subinnetive; yet we here see it answering to soyez. short, our signs, will, shall, should, would, could, may, and might, cannot be reduced to any thing like a comparison with the different terminations of the French verbs. These signs, besides helping to show the time, have meanings which the endings of the French verbs have nothing at all to do with. The should, for instance, in the last of the above examples, has in it something of the meaning of ought. The French verbs do not answer to these signs, except in part; to answer to these signs the French have principal verbs, of which I shall speak by-and-by. [See paragraph 444.] What I wish to do here is, to caution you against supposing that might, should, and the rest of those words, are always translated into French in the same manner. Take another instance:

De peur que cela ne soit, Je souhaite que cela soit, Je voudrais qu'il vint, Je souhaite qu'il vienne, For fear that that should be. I wish that that may be. I wish that he would come. I wish that he may come.

Here, in these two last examples, there are the would and the may, in English, to answer to the French vînt and vienne. The truth is, that besides expressing the wish of the party speaking, the would expresses the power to act in the person who is wished to come, while may simply expresses the wish that he may come.

426. There is one instance where the subjunctive is used without either verb or conjunction to govern it; this is in the case of the verb savoir, which, in the first person singular, and when it has a negative, takes the subjunctive instead of the indicative form; as, "je ne sache pas;" that is, instead of "je ne sais "pas," which latter would be the more ordinary expression. But there must be a negative, mind, or else the rule does not hold good.

[Note.—There is also a ease in which the French' frequently use the past time of the indicative in place of the compound of the past of the subjunctive. It is where our would have or should have are employed along with our passive participle, after such words of conditional meaning as if, without, unless, or but for. For example, in these sentences, which are in the writing of M. DE CHATEAUBRIAND:

- Si la Pologne cût été reformée, la race Slave reprenait son indépendence,
- Si ces maraudeurs avaient eu plus d'audace, Bonaparte demeurait prisounier,
- Sans votre intercession, ma tête roulait sur l'échafand,

If Poland had been reconstructed, the Slavonic race regained (would have regained) its independence.

If those marauders had had more boldness, Bonaparte remained (would have remained) a pri-

Without, or but for your intercession, my head rolled (would have rolled) on the scaffold.

So it is, with the French, when our if, along with the phrase were to, accompanies the verb, and expresses what is only supposed; as, again, the same writer says, Que feriez vous, si je vous what would you do, if I put (were mettais en liberté? what would you at liberty?

The English now and then use such expressions as, "but for your aid, he was (instead of would have been) "a ruined man." The difference is, that while these are rare in our language, they are very common in French.]

427. So much for the indicative and the subjunctive modes. I observed before, that the far greater part of the verbs, or, rather, forms of verbs, are indicative. You may sometimes read whole pages of print without meeting with a verb in the subjunctive. But there is, nevertheless, an absolute necessity to learn this part of the grammar well, in order to become a French scholar; for, observe, to say, "il faut que je vais," is broken French. It is as bad and as broken as I must went would be in English. The modes embrace some very abstruse matter; but if there were no difficulties to overcome, there would be no honour and no pleasure in the aequisition.

428. The Imperative Mode. This will give us but little trouble: it has been fully explained in the Etymology. It subjects the verb to no changes. It has no times: it is simply the verb, in its present indicative time, uttered, or addressed, to the first person plural and to the second persons of both numbers; and in the third persons of both numbers, it is the verb in the present of the subjunctive. The whole thing is, in fact, exhibited at the end of overy one of the conjugations. I will, however, for convenience sake, exhibit it again here, and then make a few short remarks on the use of the imperative mode.

let us go, or, go we.
go, or, go you.
let them go.

I have, at the close of paragraph 116, fully explained the source and reason of these expressions. Now, as to the manner of employing the imperative mode in sentences, it is generally the same in both languages: but you must observe that the third persons of the imperative mode must always have the que before them.

429. Exclamations are generally formed by the use of verbs in the imperative mode. But there is one verb (voir) used in this way, which is of so much " importance that it merits a paragraph to itself. The expressions voici and voilà are composed of part of the verb voir and the adverbs ci and là. In both cases we have the second person singular of the imperative of voir, which (see paragraph 239) is vois; that is, see thou. You have, in paragraph 317, seen the important part that ci and là act along with the Demonstrative Pronouns. The first, you know, means here, and the other there; as, "ce livre-ci, ce livre-là," "this book here, this book there." So, you see, though the Cockneys have been so much ridiculed for their this here pie, and that there pudding, they have the polite French language to keep them in countenance. But the truth is, for our this and that the French have only ce; they are, therefore, compelled to resort to the use of cioand là. Well, then, now comes voici and voilà. The s of vois is dropped as unnecessary; but the expressions are vois ci and vois là, that is, literally, see here and see there; and endless is the number of ways in which the French use them, and particularly the latter; the manuer of employing which is one of the greatest beauties of the language. They are not employed to express any thing about seeing. If we want to tell any one to look at or to see any thing, we use regardez or voyez; as:

Regardez l'oisean, Voyez l'heure qu'il est, look at the bird. see what o'clock it is. Voici and voilà are used to express parts of our verb to be, used with our adverbs here and there; as:

Here is a basket of cherries for you, | voici voici un panier de cerises pour vous.

But these words are made use of instead of that is, this is, and it is, and instead of other pronouns used with être.

Le voici qui travaille,

Le voilà qui chaute, Ne voilà-t-il pas une drôle d'affaire?

Voici qui est beau, Voilà qui est beau,

here he is working, or at work, there she is singuig. is not this an odd affair?

this is fine.

there, then, it is all over.

In narratives, when the writer or speaker wishes to give life to his narrative, he uses voilà, and thus, in a manner, brings the persons and things before you; as:

Il commençait à pleuvoir, et me voilà sans abri.

Comme nous allious nous mettre à table muli un messager, qui entre dans la salle à manger, it began to rain, and there was I without shelter.

In this last example there is, in the English, neither there nor is. The voilà is not expressed at all: nor can it be with propriety. We do, indeed, see, even in printed translations, attempts to translate the voilà in sentences like this: we do hear translators say; "as "we were sitting down to table, behold, a messenger "entered." But this is not English language. We must have entered, and who enters; and if we have not the entering in the present time, what becomes of the behold? Take care, then, how you translate passages with voici, or voilà, in them.

Ne voilà-t-il pas une belle journée? Je l'ai donné au Monsieur que voilà, is it not a fine day?

I have given it to that gentleman.

I beg you to pay great attention to what I have said with regard to these words. They are in constant usc. They occur, perhaps, on an average, once a minute in every conversation. We may say, in French, "il commençait à pleuvoir, et j'étais là sans "abri:" but this is not French language, though the words are French.

430. THE INFINITIVE MODE. Read again (though you have so recently read it) paragraph 114, and then go on with me. One of the greatest differences in the two languages lies in the manner of employing the infinitive and the active participle. We, in English, make continual use of the latter; the French very little; and in many cases where we always use it, they never can. This is the case, as we have seen, in the present and past times; as:

I am drinking. je bois,
You were enting, je bois,
They are marching, ils marchent, ils marchent,
ils marchent.

The three last are not only not good French, but they are nothing at all. They are letters and sounds, marks upon paper, and noise; but they form no part of language. Pray mind this; for there is nothing that we English break ourselves of with so much difficulty as of the proneness to eling to our ings, and to force the French language to admit the words which literally answer to them.

431. The French use, in many eases, the infinitive, when we use the active participle; but I shall notice this more under the head of Participles. The main thing respecting the infinitive is this; that there are certain verbs and adjectives which require debefore the infinitive; certain other verbs and adjectives which require à before the infinitive; certain other verbs that take neither de nor à nor any other preposition before the infinitive; certain other verbs that take either de or à before the infinitive; and, last of all, certain nouns that take de before the next infinitive. But to give any thing under the name of rule, to teach you when to use à and when to use de, would be to disgust you: at the end of each of twenty rules, or more, there must come more, perhaps, than twenty exceptions, making four hundred in the whole; so that to enter into detail here would be to go far in the making of a dictionary. [See the Note at end of paragraph 454.]

432. But there are these observations to make; that when our English verb is followed by the preposition of, from, at, upon, about, with, or after, before an active participle, the DE is commonly used before the infinitive in French; and that when our preposition is to, in, or for, the French preposition commonly is λ : as:

I employ myself in writing, I keep myself from writing, je m'occupe à écrire. je m'abstiens d'écrire.

That is to say, "I employ myself in to write:" "I keep "myself from to write." The sense of the words affords a good reason for the use of \hat{a} and of de in these cases; but this is far from being always the case. The use of these prepositions before verbs in the infinitive seems, in numerous cases, to be quite capricious. All that we can say is, that the French language will have it thus; and that the difficulty being great, our perseverance and patience must be great also. However, you will, even by this time, have acquired, from writing, reading, and speaking, the habit of using \hat{a} and de in a proper manner three times out of four.

433. Besides de and à, there is pour, used before the infinitives of French verbs. This pour is used when our to means in order to, or for the purpose of; as:

De l'eau pour boire, water to drink.

But pour is also used in cases where we use for followed by the active participle; as:

Il sera récompensé pour avoir | he shall be rewarded for having bien travaillé, | worked well.

We might say for working. But neither of these; neither pour ayant nor pour travaillant can be used in French. Guard yourself against the attempt by all means; for this mode of expression is no more the language of the French than it is the language of horses.

- 434. When the infinitive is (as was observed in paragraph 114) a noun: as, "to quarrel is disagreeable;" it may be expressed in English by the active participle; as, "quarrelling is disagreeable." But in French you must adhere to the infinitive, and say, "disputer sest "désagréable." It is much better to say, "il est "désagréable de disputer;" but, at any rate, you must avoid translating quarrelling by disputant.
- 435. A verb which has before it a word expressing sufficiency, or too much, takes pour; as, "ils sont assez "forts pour le faire," they are strong enough to do it. But, observe, if the word of sufficiency do not come before the verb, there is no pour before it. [See the Note at the end of paragraph 454.]
- 436. THE PARTICIPLES. In paragraph 117 [and also in paragraphs 192, 199, and 373] I spoke of the Participles; I told you why they were so called; and in the Conjugations you have seen enough of them as far as relates to their formation. I have just spoken, also, of our English ACTIVE PARTICIPLE as answering, in many cases, to the French infinitive. This active participle is, with us, verb, adjective, noun, alternately; as:

- 1. Seeing that he was going away I spoke to him.
- 2. A seeing man is not easily deceived.
- 3. Seeing is believing.

Now, as verb, we use this participle in French; but never as adjective or as noun. Therefore, when we find it either of these, in English, we must give the French phrase a wholly different turn.

- 1. Voyant qu'il s'en allait, je lui parlai.
- 2. Un homme qui voit n'est pas facile à tromper.
- 3. Voir c'est croire.

And never un voyant homme, voyant c'est croyant: never, on any account, is a word of this sort to be considered an adjective or a noun. Therefore, this participle is always indeclinable; that is, it never changes its, form to denote either number or gender. There are a few law-terms, indeed, that appear to be exceptions; but even these are not; and you will be sure to bear in mind, that it is, in French, never adjective and never noun. This constitutes one of the great differences in the two languages. When you have an ING to translate into French, take good care how you attempt to translate it by the French active participle. [See Note following paragraph 440.]

437. Even in its verbal capacity this participle must be used very sparingly. We, in English, say, for instance, instead of yoing; the French never; they say, "au lien d'aller;" that is, instead of to yo. After almost all the prepositions we, in English, use this participle; but the French use it after en (in) only:

After having,
For fear of being,
For want of asking,
Without speaking,
By writing,
Instead of swimming,
Save giving,

après avoir, de crainte d'être, faute de demander, sans parler, par écrire, au lieu de noger, sanf à donner,

I give you all these examples that you may have a visible and striking proof of the difference in the two languages in this respect.

438. The active participle is frequently used after en when it is a preposition, answering to in, and, at times, when it answers to our by, or while, and, perhaps, some other of our prepositions and adverbs; as:

En fesant cela vous m'obligerez beaucoup.
Cest en étudiant qu'on apprend un langue étrangère, Tout en la illant mon omelette, cile mo toisait,

in doing that you will much oblige me,
it is by studying that one learns a foreign language.
it is by studying that one learns a foreign language.
it is by studying that one learns a foreign language, or eithe while that she was burning my omelet, she kept eying me from head to loot.

I have introduced this word toiser to give you an instance of how much is sometimes said by a word more than can be said by any other word (answering to that one) in another language.

439. The active participle is, as we have seen, in some eases, in English, a noun; as, the falling of the house killed the inhabitants. Here are, article, noun in the nominative ease, verb, and noun in the objective ease. Literally the sentence would be thus translated:

The falling of the house killed the inhabitants, e tombant de la maison tua les habitans.

Now, mind, the like of this can never be said in French. The language of geese would be as intelligible to a Frenchman as this. You must say,

Let chute de la maison tua les habitans, | the fall of the house killed the inhabitants,

La malson, en tombant, tuales habitans, the house, in falling, killed the inhabi-

Either of these English phrases will do; but neither is so good as that from which the French language flees as from head-splitting dissonance. Whenever there is, in English, an article, a possessive pronoun, or any word which being put before the active participle shows it to be a noun, it never can be rendered in French by the active participle, unless with en: it must be answered by a noun or by an infinitive:

The bleating of the sheep, The cheating of his master, Her complaining of her husband, The cause of his going away yesterday, le bêlement des moutons. la fourberie fuite à son maître. ses plaintes contre son mari. la cause pourquoi il s'en alla hier.

Boileau, in one of his poems, addressed to Louis XIV., exclaims,

"Grand Roi! cesse de vaincre ou je cesse d'écrire." Now, though we say,

Great King, cease to conquer, or I cease to write, we may also say,

Great King, cease conquering, or I cease writing:

but this you must never attempt to say in French; and against such attempts I cannot too often caution you. I know of no part of our language which so puzzled me to turn into French, as those scutences in which we find the article, or the possessive pronoun, before our active participle; and I cannot refrain from adding another example or two in order to make this quite clear to you:

being so much respected, being so much respected, Ther being young is much in her favour, sa founces fast beaucoup pour elle. Their coming hither has ruined them, ils ont etc ruipes a cause qu'ils sont entre le ruipes a cause qu'ils sont etc ruipes a cause qu'ils sont etc ruipes de la cause qu'ils sont etc.

His coming here has made his fortune, il dolt sa fortuno a ce qu'il est venu lei. Her pleasing them made her get a rich elle a trouvé un marl riche parce qu'elle a su leur plaire.

Nothing can more strongly characterize the two languages. Not the least resemblance is there between them in this respect.

440. It only remains for me to speak of the employing of the French active participle before an adjective, or before a passive participle, or with que before a noun, or a pronoun; as:

Having been at the play last night, Seeing that it was going to rain, liaving heard that they were coming, Perceiving that it was not very late, Knowing very well that she would not come, Believing that he dared not go thither.

Being Ill I could not go to their house.

Walking in the street I met them, ayant été à la comédie hier au soir. voyant qu'il allait pleuroir. ayant appris qu'ils allaient veuir, s'appercevant qu'il n'était pas fort tard, sachant très-bien qu'elle ne viendrait croyant qu'il n'osnit u aller. en me promenant dans la rue je les rencontrai. étant malade je ne pouvais aller chez eux.

The manner of using the participle is, in this case, nearly the same in both languages. We say, having seen: the French say, ayant vu; we say, seeing that; they say, voyant que. So that, in this respect, there is no difference worth speaking of. Indeed, nearly all that you have to do with regard to the French active participle is, never to employ it as an adjective, nor as a noun.

Note.—This last sentence, like what is said in paragraphs 192 and 436, means literally more than the author intended. / There are some instances, though comparatively few, in which the French active participle does become a noun, answering to our active participle, or to our noun when derived from a verb, and ending in er, or or; as:

un virant, les vivants, un croyant, un voyant, un médisant, un conquérant, a living person. the living, or those alive, a believer, or Christian. one having sight, a scer. a reviler. a conqueror.

These are the participles of vivre, croire, voir, médire. and conquérir .- But there are vast numbers of French adjectives which are simply the active participle, whether of active or of neuter verbs, used in an adjective sense, and, therefore, by some grammarians, called verbal adjectives. Thus, M. DE LAMARTINE speaks of "les Turcs, le scul peuple tolérant," the Turks, the only tolerant (tolerating) people. So, in "il est fatiguant d'étudier toujours," it is fatiguing to study continually, he participle in each language becomes an adjective. The word when adjective must, of course, follow the rule as to agreement, in number and gender, with the noun, the final ant changing to ants, ante, antes, accordingly. Thus, from the verbs entreprendre, divertir, humilier, fleurir, convaincre, monter, surprendre, dominer, changer, choquer, the Freuch have

enterprising man. enterprising men. amusing work. humiliating yoke, flourishing corpire, convincing proof, convincing proofs, rising tide. surprising tide, dominant religion, changeable colour, shocking manners.

Some of these may come either before or after the noun; as, afligeant spectacle or spectacle afligeant, afflicting sight; charmante denoiselle or demoiselle charmante, charming young lady.

441. We now come to the PASSIVE PARTICIPLE. You know it well, as to what it comes from, and asto the reason of its name. You ought to go back to paragraph 117, and there read my description of the nature of the participles. Here you see, then, that, while our active participle sometimes performs the office of an adjective, at others of a verb, and, at others, of a noun, the passive participle sometimes performs the office of an adjective, and at others of a verb. We have just seen a great deal about the active participle; but let us take a view of both together here; thus:

Active, { A proscribing man, A man who is proscribing, Proscribing is horrible, Passive, { A proscribed man, A man who has proscribed. | un homme qui est à proscrite. | un homme proscrit. | un homme qui a proscrit. | un homme qui a proscrit. | un homme qui a proscrit. |

Here we see both these words in all their functions. It is the passive participle that we have now to do with; and here you see it in both its capacities, namely, that of an adjective and that of a verb. These distinctions would be useless were the form of the word always the same. Little need we English care when our passive participle is adjective, or when it is verb, seeing that we always write it with the same letters. The active participle is, in both languages, unchangeable in its form [excepting as mentioned in the preceding Note], and is, therefore, attended with little difficulty, compared with the passive participle, which, in French, is liable to changes in its form; which, in fact, like an adjective, changes its form to agree in number and gender with its noun; and which makes its changes precisely according to the rules laid down in Letter VIII, for the forming of the numbers and genders of adjectives. How different from our passive participle, which never undergoes any changes of form! It is always written in the same way. We say, "a proscribed man, a proscribed "woman;" but the French must say, "un homme "proscrit, une femme proscrite." We say, "two proscribed men;" they, "deux hommes proscrits." Well, but we know how to form plural numbers and feminine genders? Yes, but the French passive participle is not, in all cases, liable to changes of form. It is, in some cases, a word which, like an adverb, has no changes of form; and our difficulty is, to know when we ought to make it a changeable word, and when we ought not. This is a real difficulty; though it, like all our other difficulties, is to be quickly overcome, if we be attentive and industrious. You must perceive, that it is of great consequence to know when you are to write (and pronounce also) proscrit, when proscrits, when proscrite, and when proscrites. And, mind, you cannot ascertain this from the Dictionary, as you can the gender of nouns and many other things. This is a matter which depends upon the construction of the sentence. and upon other circumstances, which are of infinite variety, and are purely contingent. In such a case; therefore, no dictionary can exhibit examples to be of any use. Take an instance in the use of the passive participle of our old acquaintance TROUVER.

J'ai trouré une brebis cette après-midi; mais elle n'est pas si bonne que la brebis que j'ai trourée ce matin, I have found an ewe this afternoon; but she is not so good as the ewe which I found this morning.

Now, you see here, that the person who finds is the same in both instances; the thing found is, in both instances, the same in number and in gender; and yet, in one instance, we make use of trouvé, and in the other of trouvée. In the first instance we use the participle without changing its termination; and in the last, we change its termination to make it agree in gender with brebis. Take a few more examples:

Avez-vous trouvé cet homme? Oui, je l'ai trouvé, Avez-vous trouvé ces hommes? Oui, je les ai trouvés, Avez-vous trouvé cette femme? Oui, je l'ai trouvé, Avez-vous trouvé ces femmes? Oui, je les ai trouvées.

Have you found that man? Yes, I have found him. Have you found those men? Yes, I have found them. Have you found that woman? Yes, I have found her. Have you found those women? Yes, I have found them.

Thus, you see, it is always found in English, though it is trouvé, trouvée, trouvés, or trouvées in French; and you see that these changes take place in the French participle only sometimes. You see that while trouvé and trouvée are both applied to the finding of the femme, trouvé and trouvées are both applied to the finding of the femmes, and also that with the plural hommes, both trouvé and trouvés are applied. It is clear, then, that the changes in the form of the passive participle must depend, not upon the numbers and genders of the nouns only, but partly upon the construction of the sentences; that is to say, the manner in which, with regard to other words, the participle stands in the sentence.

442. Let us now see, theu, what rules we can take for our guide here, beginning with those cases in which the passive participle is subject to the changes above mentioned.

FIRST. It is subject to change (generally speaking) when it has the verb être before it. But, mind, this is only generally. It is, however, always subject to change when it is used merely as an adjective. I will take the verb proscrire for my illustration here, as far as it will suit. Proscrire is, you know (see paragraph 201), conjugated like écrire, which you find conjugated in paragraph 216. The passive participle is, you sec, écrit; and, therefore, the passive participle of proscrire is proscrit. This, to make the plural masculine, changes to proscrits; to make the singular feminine, it changes to proscrite; and, to make the plural feminine, it changes to proscrites. Now, then, observe, the passive participle is always subject to change its form when it is used merely as an adjective; as:

Un homme proscrit, Deux hommes proscrits, Une femme proscrite, Deux femmes proscrites, a proscribed man. two proscribed men. a proscribed woman. two proscribed women.

Now, observe, this is invariably the case, when the participle is thus used plainly and clearly as an adjective. But, we ought to notice, that the être is understood in all these instances; for, we mean, "un homme qui a "êtê proserit," "a man who has been proscribed." The passive participle is, as I said before, generally subject to change when it comes after the verb être. And, mind, the passive participle must always have either être or acoir before it; for, though we use it sometimes without expressing être, that verb is, in such cases, as we have just seen, always understood. Well, then, let us see first how the participle is used with être, and then how it is used with avoir.

SECOND. The participle changes its form when it is used with être, when the verb to which it belongs is a neuter verb, or when it is a passiva verb, whether reflected or not; as:

he is gone away. sing. & plu. Neuter they are gone away, masc. Verb. she is gone away, sing. & plu. they are gone away, fem. he is proscribed, sing. & plu. Passive they are proscribed, masc. Verb. she is proscribed. sing. & plu. they are proscribed, fem.
he has cut himself, sing, & plu.
they have cut themselves, masc. ites. Reflected | Il s'est coupé, Elle s'est coupee, Elles se sont coupées she has cut herself. sing. & plu. Verb. they have cut themselves,

But, now, there are some seeming exceptions to this; and these you must very exactly attend to. If the verb être can have its place conveniently supplied by avoir, which often happens in using the participles of reflected verbs, the participle does not change its form; as:

Elle s'est coupé le bras, she has cut her arm.

You see this may be expressed by avoir: "elle a coupé "son bras." But the truth is, that here is action, and the action is done to the arm: the participle is not really passive. It has être before it; but être, as you know, is used instead of avoir in conjugating the reflected verbs. The two participles alle and venu, when there is a pronoun in the objective case before être, and a verb after the participle, do not change their form; as:

Il lui est allé parlfr, le is gone to speak to him.

Ils leur sont allé parler, they are gone to speak to them.

But this is not the case, if the place of the pronoum in the objective case be changed; for then the participle does change its form: as:

Il est alle lui, parler, . Ils sont alles leur parler, he is gone to speak to him. they are gone to speak to them.

In the first of these cases (allé parler) the two words make, in some sort, but one: "Gone to speak to." But, in the latter case, there is a clear separation. The verb être is the only one that has any connection with allé. Speak to is a fresh verb, and it governs les in the objective case; whereas in the former instance allé parler govern lui and leur. But besides allé and venu, there are some participles which do not, when followed by another verb, change their form, though they have être before them; as:

Le livre qu'il s'est proposé de lire, the book that he has proposed to read.

Les livres qu'il s'est proposé de lire, the books that he has proposed to read.

Here is no change in the form of the participle; and the reason is, that in such cases as this the participle is closely connected with the verb that follows: the proposing to read and the reading make but one affair. one act.

[The rule, here, appears to be, that when the subject, or nominative of the verb, and the object of the verb, are two different persons or things, or, rather, when the nominative is but an indirect object, and there is another and direct object of the verb, the participle undergoes no change. Such is the case in the foregoing examples, where le bras and de lire are the immediate objects of couper and proposer, and se As, again: is only an indirect object.

Ces hommes se sont bâti une maison,

Ces femmes se sont procuré un emploi,

Those men have built (for) themselves à house.

Those women have procured (for) themselves an employment,

The participles, in this case, need no more change than in saying "Ils ont bûti une maison;" "Elles ont procuré "un emploi" (they have built a house; they have procured an employment). The indirect object may be said to be governed by the preposition, which is either expressed or understood. So it is with the two former examples, where, in French, the literal meaning is, "she has cut to herself the arm," "he has pro-"posed to himself to read." It is the same if the reflected verb be neuter, no direct object beyond the action of the verb being expressed; as in "Ils se sont "ecrit, Ils se sont parlé," they have written, they have spoken, to themselves, or to each other.-But frequently the nominative and the direct object of the verb are strictly one and the same, and then the participle must agree in number and gender with the noun or pronoun; as:

Ces hommes se sont persuadés de cela, Ces femmes se sont présentées à la porte.

Those men have persuaded themselves of that.

Those women have presented

Those women have presented themselves at the door.

Here the sole objects of the persuading and the presenting are the men and women themselves, there being no sense of a preposition to denote such relation of a direct to an indirect object as in the previous examples. Therefore here, making the participle to agree, we must say, "Nous nous sommes trouvés malades," we found ourselves ill; "Ils se sont entendus," they heard themselves; and not trouvé, entendu.]

443. Third. 1 I now come to the use of the passive participle with avoir. Generally the participle does not change its form, when it has any part of avoir before it. Let us take avoir with proscrit and coupé.

Il a prosenit,
Ils out proserit,
Elle a proserit,
Elles out proserit,
Il a coupé,
Il out coupé,
Elle a coupé,
Elles out coupé,

he has proscribed, they have proscribed, she has proscribed. they have proscribed, he has cut. they have cut. she has cut. they have cut.

Here you see there are no changes in the form of the participle, as there are when it is used with être. But this is not always the case: and now we are going to see how the participle is affected by the construction of the sentence, of which I spoke at the close of the paragraph 441, and which you will now look at again. You saw, in paragraph 441, the instances of homme and femme. Look at them again; and then we will take another example.

Il a proscrit aujourd'hui les demmes qu'il a proscrites l'année passée, he has proscribed the women to-day whom he proscribed last year.

Here the person who proscribes is the same in both cases, the persons proscribed are the same in both cases; and yet the participle does not change its form, in one case, to express number and gender, and does change its form for that purpose in the other case. Now, the reason is this: in the first instance, the participle has an active meaning, and in the second a passive meaning. In both instances we have the compound time of the verb proscrire; but in the first the object is to express what the man has done; and in the second to express what the man has done; and done to them. In the latter instance the meaning is passive: it means that the women were proscribed, furent proscrites, last year. The participle, in this last instance, characterizes the women. It is intended, not so much to assert any thing about them, as to say who or what they are. This is the reason of the change being made in the participle in the one case, and not in the other; and out of this reason has come this rule, that when a passive participle, coming after avoir, has going before it a noun or pronoun in the objective case, and governed in that case by avoir and the participle; then the participle does change its form to express number and gender. Now, try the last example by this rule:

Il a proscrit les femmes aujourd'hui.

Here there is no noun nor pronoun in the objective case going before a proscrit. The il is in the nominative case. The il is the subject, and les femmes is the object; but, in qu'il a proscrites l'année passée,

we have qu', that is, que (whom), which goes before the participle, and which is in the objective case, and governed in that case by avoir and the participle; and, therefore, the participle changes its form. Thus, you see, it depends, in many cases, on the place which the participle occupies in the sentence, whether it be to change its form or not. Monsieur Restaut says, that "when the participle ceases to have a passive signification, it is indeclinable; that is, it does not change its "form;" and he says, that "it does cease to have the "passive signification, when it forms, with avoir, the "compound times of any verb, whether active or neuter." This is, indeed, frequently the case, but it is far from being always, or even generally, the case; and I wonder how the observation found its way to the paper from so able a pen as that of Monsteur Restaut. Why, in "qu'il a proscrites," the participle forms, with avoir, the compound time of an active verb; and yet the participle changes its form. But let us take an example from Monsieur Restaut himself.

J'ai reçu les lettres que vous m'avez écrites au sujet de l'affaire que je vous avais proposée: et après les avoir lues avec attention, j'ai reconnu, comme vous, que si je l'avais entreprise, j'y aurais trouvé des obstacles, que je n'avais pas prévus.

Here are eight participles, each of which, with avoir, forms a compound time of the verb; and yet three of them (reçu, reconnu, trouvé) do not change their form. It is clear, then, that it is the place of the participle that is to be attended to here. The word lettres is a plural feminine, and accordingly it has écrites in the above sentence:

les lettres que vous m'avez écrites.

But why not make the participle of recevoir agree also with lettres? Why not write,

J'ai reçues les lettres, and not requ? Because, in the instance first here mentioned the que (which) represents lettres, and which is in the objective case, governed by avec écrites, goes before the participle; and because, in the last instance, les lettres, which is in the objective, and governed by ai requ, comes after the participle. The same may be said of lues, and, indeed, of all other participles thus used:

J'ai envoyé dix oiseaux à la ville, | I have sent ten birds to the town. Les dix oiseaux que j'ai envoyés, | the ten birds that I have sent. Thus, then, it is the place of the participle that you have principally to look to, in order to regulate your conduct in the use of it. Now there are only two exceptions to this rule. The first is, that, in the impersonals with avoir the participle never changes its form; as:

La chaleur qu'il a fait, Le froid qu'il a fait, the hot weather that has been. the cold weather that has been.

Here, you see, chalcur is feminine, and froid masculine; and yet the participle does not change its form. The reason of this is, that the il, in this il fait, does not represent any actor. There is no action; there is nothing done to the heat or the cold. If the fait had related to something done to a thing, it would have been otherwise; as:

La table qu'il a faite, L'habit qu'il a fait. the table that he has made. the coat that he has made.

The other exception is similar to that mentioned in the last paragraph: namely, when the participle is followed by a verb, which, together with the participle, expresses but one idea, and when the two are rather one word than two. When this is the case, though the noun or pronoun, which is in the objective, come before the participle, the participle does not change its form; as:

Le papier que j'ai vu trouver, La plume que j'ai vu trouver, the paper that I have seen found. the pen that I have seen found.

You see that, in these cases, there is a verb coming after the participle, and expressing, together with the participle, but one idea. If it were not for this reason, the participle would change its form; as:

 l'habit que j'ai fait, les habits que j'ai faits.

[Note.—Some further illustration may be useful in Agreeing with the foregoing, observe the following examples, wherein, whatever the number or gender, the participle remains unchangeable:

La chose, on les choses que vous avez entendu dire, L'histoire, on les histoires que neus avons entendu raconter,

The thing, on the things that you have heard said. The history, on the histories that we have heard related.

Here, in English, as in French, it might be heard say (to say), instead of heard said, just as we may have heard tell (to tell) instead of heard told; though we could not well say heard relate (to relate) instead of heard related. The French idiom, on the contrary, will not allow such expressions as "entendu dit," "entendu The French idiom requires the infinitive of the one verb after the participle of the other, as in the above examples, while our way commonly is to use the participle of the second verb to answer to that French infinitive. And in this case, that is, where the English participle is followed by another passive participle, the French participle, used with the infinitive, is unchange-As, again, with the following: able.

Les troupe mx que j'ai vu garder, Les chansons que j'ai entendu chanter, The songs that I have heard sung.

Here, in these four examples, the absence of agreement is said to be because the participle has not for its objects the chose or choses, histoire or histoires, troupeaux, chansons, but the acts expressed by the verbs dire, raconter, garder, chanter. -- There is, however, this distinction to be noticed, that when the antecedent is the object of what is expressed by the participle, that participle does change to agree, exactly the same as an adjective: as:

Les bergers que l'al vus garder ces trou- ; The Shepherds that I have seen tend les chansons, peaux,

Les Dames que j'ai entendues chanter The ladies that I have heard sing the songs.

Here it is the bergers and the dames who are the objects, and not the acts expressed by the garder and chanter. This distinction is further shown by observing, that to represent the French infinitive, as in these two latter examples, we may also use our active participle, and say, "the shepherds that I have seen tending," "the ladies that I have heard singing." But it would be scarcely usual, if correct, to say, "the flocks that "I have seen tending" (meaning tended), or "the songs "that I have heard singing" (meaning sung).—It must be noted that the participle of faire, to make or do, when thus employed before an infinitive, never changes. Therefore it must be,

Les bergers que j'ai fait garder le troupeau, Les femmes qu'ils ont fait chanter, The shepherds that I have made tend the flock.
The women whom they have made sing.
It is they whom you have made to do that.

Ce sont eux que vous avez fait faire cela, and not faits garder, faites chanter, faits faire.—The participle été never changes. The same is the case with pu and fallu, participles of pouvoir and falloir. And voulu, from vouloir, and dû, from devoir, are seldom declinable.]

There is another exception; but it seems rather matter of taste; good authors differ in opinion about it. I will, however, give an example or two relating to it. The French sometimes put the nominative case after the verb; thus: "le taureau qu'a vendu Jacques." The usual order of the words is, le taureau que Jacques a rendu. Now, these authors say that when the nominative is placed thus, after the verb, the participle is inideclinable; as:

Le taureau qu'a vendu Jacques,
La vache qu'a vendu Jacques, Les taureaux, qu'a vendu Jacques, the bull that James has sold. the cow that James has sold. the bulls that James has sold. [In this form of expression, MARMONTEL thus makes the participle to agree with the noun: "une bonne "leçon qu'a reque notre misanthrope" (a good lesson that our misanthrope has received). Cornelle uses the participle without such agreement: "les misères que "durant notre enfance ont enduré nos pères" (the miseries which, during our infancy, our fathers have endured.)

If the nominative had gone before the verb, the participle must have changed its form; as:

Le taureau que Jacques a vendu, La vache que Jacques a vendue, Les vaches que Jacques a vendues.

The same anthors insist that when there comes, next after the participle, a noun in the objective case, or an adjective relating to the noun or pronoun which has gone before, the participle ought not to change its form. Monsieur Restaut gives this example: "Dicu les avait "créé innocents." The les (them) would require créés; but those authors say that the adjective innocent, coming after the participle, and having relation to les, the participle ought not to change its form. However, this seems to be a disputed point; we may adopt either the one manner or the other; and I have mentioned this matter here only to enable you to account for what might otherwise appear strange to you. I here conclude my remarks on the passive participle. long; but the matter is of uncommon importance. Every page of French print contains, in general, many of these words. When you are about to use one of them, you cannot, as in the case of the gender of nouns, get your information from the Dictionary. You must have it, if you have it at all, from principles and rules.- I shall now give you an Exercise relating to the Modes of Verbs, which, of course, include the Participles.

LETTER XXIV.

SYNTAX OF VOULOIR, POUVOIR, AND DEVOIR.

My DEAR RICHARD,

444. Before you enter on the subject of this letter, look at paragraphs 424 and 425. Indeed, you must not only look at them, but read them with attention. You see, then, that the different endings, the differences in the form, of the French verbs, are not always sufficient to express, in French, that which is expressed in English by our little words, which are called signs, and which are, shall, will, can, could, might, should, would, and ought. We have must besides; but that is, as we have seen, answered by the il faut of the French. Let us take an example of this insufficiency:

I shall come here to-morrow, I will come here to-morrow, je viendrai ici demain.

Thus, you see, there is only the one French word, viendrai, to answer to shall come, and will come, and we all know how different these are in their meanings. When I say, I shall come, I simply tell you of my intention; but will come expresses my resolution, or, at least, a promise, or assurance, on my part. Yet the French verb has no change to express this difference. Their verb does for the simple telling or announcing; but, to do justice to I will, the French must have some other word, or words, brought in; such as, "je vous "promets," or, "je suis resolu."

You shall not have that card, You will not have that card, vous n'aurez pas cette carte. vous n'aurez pas cette carte. The French verbs are the same, you see, in both eases: but, in the first phrase, I express my will and determination against your having the eard; and, in the second, I merely foretell or observe that you will not have the eard. See, now, how the proper translation of these two English phrases would stand, supposing me to be talking to you.

You shall not have that card, { Jo no veux pas que vous ayez cette carte, or, Je ne vous permettrat pas d'avoir cette carte, vous n'aurez pas cette carte.

In the latter case I say, in this French phrase, simply that you will not have the eard: but, in the other case, I say, my will is that you have not the eard; or, I will not permit you to have the eard. So that, you clearly see that the changes in the form of the French verb are by no means sufficient to express that which is expressed in English by our little words. As long as the business of the verb is merely to announce or declare, the French changes answer the purpose pretty well; but, wherever our little words, or verbal signs; wherever there is will, permission, power, or duty expressed by these signs; there the changes in the form of the French verb fail of being sufficient for the purpose of answering fully and clearly to our verbs.

445. But the French have words which (in great part at least) make up for this deficiency. These are three verbs which express, respectively, will, power, and duty; and which, therefore, are employed to answer (in most eases) to our will, and would; our may, can, could, and might; and our should and ought. I say in great part, in most cases; because, there is no complete rule as to the matter. You will observe (and, indeed, you must already have observed in the conjugations), that VOULOIR, POUVOIR, and DEVOIR are verbs complete in all their parts. In short, you know them perfectly well in all their numbers, persons, times, and modes; and you can, I hope, write down the conjugations of them without looking even at your card of verbs. You will, however, mind now, that VOULOIR means, to will, to be willing, to desire, to wish, to be determined, to be resolved, and, when in the negative, it expresses objection and opposition. You will mind, also, that POUVOIR means, to be able, to have power, to have liberty or permission, to do or to be. Mind, moreover, that DEVOIR, though it means to ove, means also to have the duty of doing or of being. Now then, mind, that in general, these signs of ours are answered by some part of these French verbs, as placed in the following table:

may, can, could, might, should, by some part of pouroir.

should, by some part of devoir.

After all, however, you must bear in mind, that it is not always that any of these signs are thus turned into French. But you will soon learn (after all that you have learned) to make use of these important French words properly.

446. We will begin with VOULOIR. When we make use of our signs, will, would, the French employ the infinitive of their verb; and they employ some part of vouloir to answer to our will, or would; as:

I will find,
I would find,
You will find,
They will find,

je veux trouver. je voulais trouver, vous voulez trouver. ils veulent trouver.

This is always the manner of turning these signs into French. Our will applies to both present and future. I'suppose it here to apply to the present, where it expresses will or resolution, and must be translated by vouloir. When it simply intimates or foretells, the changes in the French verb are sufficient; as:

You will find, He will find, vous trouverez.
il trouvera.

The French, you see, take our principal verb; they translate it; they put it in the infinitive; they then put before it a part of the verb vouloir, to answer to our will or would. Thus, in this sentence:

I will write in spite of him, | je veux écrire malgré lui.

You see, they take our write (not our to write), and put écrire in place of it; and then they put a part of their verb vouloir, according to mode, number, and person. If, instead of will or would, we use any part of to wish, to desire, to be willing, or the like, the French take this verb, and translate it by some part of vouloir; as:

I wish him to write to me, je veux qu'il m'écrive. I desire him to write, je veux qu'il écrive.

We may also say, je souhaite qu'il m'écrive, je désire qu'il écrive: but custom and idiom lean strongly towards vouloir. I should observe, before I quit this verb, that when we use the verb to be willing, or any expression of the same, or nearly the same, meaning, the French, in rendering the phrase, put bien before vouloir; as:

I am willing for him to write,
or,
I consent to his writing,
or,
I like for him to write,

When we use the verb to have with will or would, the French use vouloir without noticing our to have; as: •

We will have him go,
You would have it so,
They will always have it their own way,
I will have it so,

nous voulors qu'il aille.
vous le voulez ainsi.
ils le veulent toujours à leur manière.
je le veux ainsi.

When we make use of the verb want to express wishing, or desiring, the French render it by vouloir; and, in this way, vouloir is in very common use; as:

What do you want?

I want some bread and some wine, if you please,
if you please,
I want to see fine weather,
She does not know what she wants. elle ne sait ce qu'elle veut.

Very numerous are the uses of the verb vouloir; but what has been here said respecting it, will, I trust, be sufficient.

447. Pouvoir. This verb, besides being a verb, is a noun, meaning power. As a verb, its meaning has just been described in paragraph 445. The verb power means, then, in general, to be able. Our may, might, can, and could, are all translated into French by power. Great care is necessary, in foreigners, to distinguish when one of these is to be used in English, and when the other; but there is no difficulty in turning them into French, seeing that they are all rendered into that language by one and the same verb; and, as to the circumstances of time and mode and person, the French verb changes its form as in other cases. It is, in fact, the conjugation of pouvoir, with another verb; pouvoir, like vouloir, being used in this case instead of Examples:

You may come next week,

He may go away when he will, Whey can read and write very well, We could not come yesterday, They might be vich if they would,

If he can come I shall be glad of it, vous pourez venir la semalno prochaine.

Il peut s'en siler quand il voudra, ils peuvent lire et écrire fort hen,
nous ne pûmes venir hier,
ils paurraient être riches s'ils le vouluent, s'il peut venir j'en serai bien aise.

Thus, then, it is merely conjugating the verb pouvoir, as in the case of vouloir, and putting the French principal verb in the infinitive. This verb, like vouloir, is in constant use; as, indeed, it must, from the nature of its functions, necessarily be. It is often employed to express capability, possibility, and the like; and in many other cases which have nothing to do with can, could, may, and might; or, at least, where they are not employed in English; as:

That is not possible, He was quite done for, -That is possible, cela ne se pent.
cela est possible, or, cela se pent.

These are odd expressions. Such they appear to us; but they are correct, and they are lively and smooth. However, they forcibly characterize this verb pouvoir. Again:

Can he come?

May he ride your horse?

Could he ride your horse?

Could he not ride my horse?

peut-il monter votre cheval?
pouvait-il monter votre cheval?
ne pouvait-il pas monter mon cheval?

Mind, in some cases, savoir is employed synonymously with pouvoir. In this sense savoir means to know how; and, if you observe, to know how to do a thing is, in English, nearly the same thing as to be able to do it; as:

I know how to make books,

or

I am able to make books,

je sais faire des livres.

je peux faire des livres.

But it is pouroir that you are to look to for the answering to our signs, may, might, can, and could. When an English phrase, having either of these words in it, is to be put into French, look to POUVOIR.

448. We now come to Devoir, which answers to our should and ought: or, at least, to should generally, and to ought always. Devoir means to owe, and our ought is, doubtless, a part of our verb to owe; for what is "I ought to go," but "I owe to go?" The origin of should is less evident; but the main difference in the two is, that ought takes the to after it before a verb, and that should does not. This shuts out should from being used before infinitives, and ought from being used before the other parts of the verb. But, in the eye of the French language they appear to be of equal merit and power, for Devoir answers to both; as:

You ought to be obedient to your master, vous devriez obeir à votre You should be obedient to your master,

There is, however, this difference in these two English verbal signs; that ought always implies duty, while should does not always do this: and, which is the material point for us, ought must always have devoir to answer to it, while should may be rendered by a change in the form of the French verb; as:

If he should travel in Spain,
If he ought to travel in Spain,
s'il voyageait en Espagne.
s'il devait voyager en Espagne.

Devoir is made use of sometimes for must. It is in cases where must does not imply any command or necessity; as, "you must be very hungry," "vous devez

"avoir grand faim." You may say, in French, "il faut "que vons ayez grand faim." Out may be as good as the other; but observe this phrase, "il doit se marier "demain." You cannot say, as a translation to this. "he must be married to-morrow." Neither will should nor ought do. The real English of it is, "he is to be married to-morrow." You see that these verbs are of great importance. They answer to whole English phrases in many instances. They are of more consequence than hundreds of other verbs. They are amongst the pivots on which the French language turns. To this knowledge that I have of their importance you have to ascribe this present LETTER, which, when I have added a short Exercise to it, will, I trust, leave you with very little to do in the learning of the French language.

LETTER XXV.

SYNTAX OF ADVERBS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

- 449. In paragraph 37 I explained to you the nature of Adverbs; and, in paragraphs 142 to 151 inclusive, I gave you rules for the forming of the words of this part of specch. You will now read all those paragraphs over again, and pay strict attention to what you find in them.
- 450. I have, in this place, only to make a remark or two as to the placing of the adverb in sentences. The place of the French adverb is, in many cases, the same as that of our adverb, but not in all cases. It generally comes after a verb and before an adjective; as:

- 451. When the French verb is in the infinitive, the adverb is sometimes put before it, when it is not before it in English; as, "pour bien faire," in order to do well. But this is very rarely the easc.
- 452. When adverbs are compound, that is to say, consist of more than one word (as was before fully explained), they follow the verb invariably. There is, and there can be, no difficulty attending the use of this part of speech. The only difference worth notice in the two languages, with respect to the using of the adverb, is this; the French hardly ever put the adverb before the verb, and we often do it; as, "j'écris souvent;" and not, as we say, "je souvent écris," I often write.

[With the compound times of verbs, the adverb in French generally stands next after the auxiliary; as, "je p'ai jamais fait cela," I have never done that; "nous l'avons toujours trouvé," we have always found him.]

LETTER XXVI.

SYNTAX OF PREPOSITIONS.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

453. It is almost more matter of form to make separate divisions relating to the Syntax of these indeclinable parts of speech. The words belonging to them are nothing of themselves: they cannot be used without nouns, pronouns, and verbs; and therefore, in treating of the Syntax of these, I have, in fact, treated of that of Prepositions.

454. Go back, however, to paragraph 38; and also to the whole of Letter XI., including paragraphs from 152 to 161. Pay attention to what you there find, and there is little to add here. The business of Syntax is, first, to teach us how to make our words agree with each other in sentences. There can be no disagreement in the case of prepositions; for they never change their Then, as to government, prepositions; when put before nouns and pronouns, cause them to be in the objective case. But this has been most amply explained in the letters relating to nonns and pronouns. As to the placing of the prepositions in the sentence, there is no difference worthy of notice in the two languages. We say in the house, for the horse, to the town, against the door, upon the floor; and the French say, dans la maison, pour le cheval, à la ville, contre la porte, sur le plancher. There are certain French prepositions, which, in different cases, must be rendered in English in a different manner. It is nearly the same with regard to our prepositions when rendered in French. I have before noticed, that while we say, think of a thing, the French say, think to a thing. But, to notice all the instances of difference between the two languages would require a book ten times as large as the French and English Dictionary in quarto. It would, besides, be to load the memory in vain; seeing that all the difficulties arising from this cause are speedily removed by practice.

EXERCISE XIX.

- Have you thought of the affair that I spoke to you of?
- 2. Yes; but I do not know what to do about it.
- 3. Whose book is that? It is John's or his sister's.
- 4. The house must be built by next Christmas.
- 5. They fought with bayonets and swords.
- 6. You enjoy your riches.
- 7. They live near to your country-house.
- 8. You ought to obey your master.

I give these few instances merely to warn you against literal translation. You will see that the French say, near of your house; and obey to your master; and enjoy of your riches. But a short time will give you a complete knowledge of all these matters.

[Note.—See what has before been said of prepositions, in paragraphs 156, 158, 159, 376, and in paragraph 431 and those immediately following.—Prepositions serve to denote the different relations or bearings which the things expressed by other parts of speech have as to one another, particularly in nouns and pronouns, in reference to verbs, and, as regards verbs, when the action of one verb has relation to that expressed by another. The meanings, therefore, which the preposition may convey, are of too great a variety to be all reduced to rule, or to be explained in a brief compass. The following remarks, nevertheless, will be found useful, by preparing the learner for some things of importance which will be met with in French.

First. The prepositions most requiring explanation are, DE and λ . These two are constantly occurring. Each of them, in its peculiar way, represents our to, while DE also represents our of and from, and λ our at, and occasionally our for.

Second. There are many cases where, two verbs coming immediately together, the second is in the infinitive. Generally, here, the French requires de or à between these, in the sense of our to. But with certain verbs there is no preposition before the French infinitive. This is the case after aimer micux, to like better, or to prefer, valoir micux, to be better or preferable, and after aller, savoir, pouvoir, devoir, falloir, oser, espérer, and a few others; as:

It is better to wait.
You are going to see.
They know how to make.
She can, or is able to come.
They ought to speak.

Third. Generally speaking, however, the French infinitive does require the proposition. And there are a good many eases in which the second verb, according to the sense of the first, may be preceded by either de or a; as:

Tâcher de, or à, Déterminer de, or à, Commencer de, or à, Continuer de, or à, Cobliger de, or à, Forcer de, or à, Manquer de, or à, To endeavour, or try to.
To determine to.
To begin to.
To continue to.
To oblige to
To force to.
To fail to.

The difference in idea between these two forms of speech is sometimes very nice. And yet there is a difference. In either case, with de or with d, the first verb always denotes an action having reference to the action of the second verb, there being but one actor, that is, the same nominative, for the two verbs. But, with de, the first verb is rather confined to expressing some motion towards, about, or in respect of the second act; while, with de, the first verb represents the actor as more positively engaged in or at that second act; as:

Je tâcherai de vous plaire, Il tâche à vous tromper. I will endeavour to please you. He endeavours to deceive you.

Here the first endeavour is stated as that of one having the purpose to please; the second, as that of one doing the act of deceiving. "Il s'ennuie de lire," means that he is tired of reading, that is, of the practice or pursuit. "Il s'ennuie à lire" may be translated by the same English words; but this, with à, more properly means that he is tired in the act of reading, or while at it.

FOURTH. Some verbs, followed by no preposition in English, must in French have de or à before the noun or pronoun which is their immediate object: as, jouir de, to enjoy, abuser de, to abuse, se défier de, to mistrust, se rappeler de, to renember. Most of these require the preposition à: as, plaire à, to please, recembler à, to resemble; and so with demander, ordonner, résister, renoncer, survivre, inspirer, reprocher, obéir.—Obéir, satisfaire, and a few 6thers, may be used either with or without the à.

FIFTH. With some verbs the French à answers to our of, about, to, for, in, or on: as in penser à, to think of or about; croire à, to believe in, or give credence to; pourvoir à, to provide for; se fier à, to confide in or rely on.

SIXTH. As to de, again, though we shall find a number of verbs with which our of is regularly represented by this French word, as in avertir de, to advise or warn of, accuser de, to accuse of, priver de, to deprive of, sc plaindre de, to complain of, se repentir de, to repent of: yet there are others with which the two languages do not answer to one another in this simple and exact way. With a vast number of this latter class the French de is used in place of all our various words of, at, for, by, with, in, and on; as:

, Se venger de, Rire, on sourir de, S'étonner de. Manoner de. Consoler de. Suffoquer de, Mourir de, Blâmer de. Se tücher de, S'anniser de, Se réjouir de, Orner de, Fournir de. Profiter de, Couvrir de. Mnnir de, Vêtir de, Remplir de. Arnier de, Nourir do.

To be revenged of, or for. To laugh, or to smile at. To be astonished at, or with. To be wanting in, or of. To console for. To choke with. To die of, with, or from. To blame for. To be sorry for, or angry with, To be amused at, by, or with. To rejoice at, or in. To ornament with. To furnish with. To profit by, or in. To cover with. To provide with. To dress with, or in. To fill with. To arm with." To feed with, or on.

With the adjectives also, whether they be formed of the passivo participles or otherwise, the de of the French performs the same office; as, plein de, full of; rempli de, filled with; orné de, decked with; content de, content with; choqué de, shocked with, or at.

Seventii. Lastly, as respects à used in the sense of our to, and de in the sense of our from, there is one important difficulty to be noticed; namely, when, with certain French verbs, these two prepositions seem to have but one meaning, though in reality they have two very distinct meanings. This happens with the verbs signifying the various acts of abstracting or removing one object from another object. Those verbs are ôter, to take away, emporter, to take or snatch away, or off, enlever, to take or carry off, arracher, to tear away, wrest, or extort, dérober, to rob, or deprive, voler, to rob or steal, and ravir, to take away by force. rule is, that when the French want merely to express the act of removing, de suffices for that purpose. But they constantly use à instead, because, by that word, they can express an idea which our from does not at all convey. When using a, they not only intimate the taking of the one object, but the idea of deprivation to. or of the taking being done with respect to, the other object; that is, of that other object's being an endurer. or object of the act. For example:

Ôtez le diner du feu, Ôtez ce couteau à cet enfant, La porte fut arrachée de ses gonds La couronne fut arrachée au roi, Take the dinner from the fire.

The door was torn from its hinges.

The crown was wrested from the king.

Some have tried to explain this apparent inconsistency by contending that the meanings of the de and the à possible, because, as we have seen, the pronouns (ne, te, se, nous, rous, lui, leur) include in themselves the sense of de but not that of de. For instance, when Florian is speaking of the Goths in Spain, he says,

'La prospérité et les richesses leur Prosperity and riches gave (to) donnèrent des vices, et leur ôtèrent la valeur guerrière,"

Prosperity and riches gave (to) them vices, and took from (to) them their warlike valour.

That is, both these verbs, ôter as well as donner, are to be understood in the French with the sense of our to, because, with each, there is the idea of an act done to the Goths, who are at once objects of the act of giving and objects of the act of taking away. The same with the examples of the child and the king. But it is different with the other two examples; because the fire is not mentioned as being deprived of the dinner, nor the hinges as objects affected by the tearing of the door. -Even the word prendre, to take, may be used in these two distinct ways. And so may the verbs soustraire, to avoid, or flee from, échapper, to escape from, disparaître, to disappear or abscond, cacher, to hide or conceal, masquer, to mask or screen, s'évader, to eyade or steal away, and éviter, to shun or clude. So the French say, "se soustraire à la poursuite," to avoid pursuit, "se cacher à la justice," to hide from justice; "échapper à ses ennemies," to escape from one's enemies.]

LETTER XXVII.

SYNTAX OF CONJUNCTIONS.

My DEAR RICHARD,

455. The remarks made in paragraph 453 apply in this case also. Every thing relative to conjunctions has been taught in the Etymology of Conjunctions, and in the Syntax of the other parts of speech, especially that of Verbs. You must go back, however, to paragraph 39, and to the whole of Letter XII., consisting of paragraphs from 162 to 167 inclusively. Those parts contain a full account of this part of speech. Conjunctions have a government of modes of verbs; but this matter is, you know, most amply explained in the Syntax of Verbs, particularly in paragraphs from 414 to 422. All that I shall, therefore, add upon this subject is, a short Exercise, consisting of phrases which must, in French, have a turn very different from that which they have in English.

EXERCISE XX.

- 1. Whether you do it, or not, I shall come.
- 2. A great building either of brick or of stone.

 - 9: If they desire to have it, and will pay for it.
 - 10. Even if he were to give his whole fortune.

LETTER XXVIII.

TRANSLATION OF THE EXERCISES.

MY DEAR RICHARD,

1. Cent livres, cinq schelins.

456. The Translation of the Exercises is given, in order that you, when you have finished your translation of an Exercise, may refer to this translation, in order to see whether you have done your work correctly. But, mind, it would be mere childishness to be looking at this translation, until you have finished an Exercise. When you have finished an Exercise, and consulted with your Grammar as to every phrase in it, then make a fair copy of it: look at it attentively over and over again; and when you have made it what you look upon as complete; when you have put all the points, all the accents, every thing; then turn to this translation, and "compare your translation with it, phrase by phrase.
